Mr. VEST. If all these documents are to go, that would be a public document, for it would be a part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Even suppose it is not a speech; say it is some other matter that I want to send to doubtful voters, a public document of any sort on this list, if it is in the hands of this superintendent, and he is disposed to do so, it can be used for sending to the same persons matter that would bring about a very different result in their opinion. To show that I am not mistaken about the scope of this bill look at the next section:

SEC. 63. He shall keep the document account of members of Congress and Departments, and on request of any Senator, Representative, or Delegate shall promptly furnish a statement of documents standing to his credit.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is done now by the superintendent of the folding room.

Mr. VEST. Here is the clause that I mean:

All orders for the distribution of documents by Senators, Representatives, or Delegates, and Departments shall be sent to the superintendent of documents on franked or other labels or in lists, which shall be kept confidential and which shall give the name and address of each and every party to whom documents are ordered sent; and it shall be the duty of the superintendent of documents to establish such a system of registration by card index, or otherwise, as will prevent duplication in the distribution of documents.

If I choose, it seems to me, to send my documents myself, or through my secretary, or through any other party, I should have that right, and I should not be compelled to go to this general superintendent for the purpose of having them distributed.

After the first word "the," in line 7 of section 62, where it reads "excepting those printed for the," I move to strike out the remainder of that section and insert what I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. In section 62, line 7, after the word "the," where it first occurs, it is proposed to strike out—use of the two Houses of Congress, which are to be distributed on the order of Members and Delegates, or are for the special official use of the Executive Departments—

And insert:

Special official use of the Executive Departments and those printed for the use of the two Houses of Congress, which are to be distributed or delivered ready for distribution on the order of Members and Delegates.

Mr. VEST. That amendment would give to Members and Delegates the right to take charge of their own documents if they saw proper to do it. If, on the other hand, they found it more convenient, and were willing to allow the superintendent to distribute them, as a matter of course that is a question for them.

I must confess that I do not like the powers proposed to be given to this superintendent. They are subject to too great abuse. At the same time I will frankly state that I do not want to defeat this bill. I know that under the present system there are great defects and great abuses. No one is better aware of that fact than myself, but I do not care to give any officer the powers that are given under this proposed act.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I do not know the extent to which the system proposed by this bill is in operation. I know that quite a number of the members of the Senate, and I know a number of the members of the House of Representatives, pursue exactly this plan; that is to say, instead of having books sent to a committee room or to their houses, they simply address slips of paper that have their franks upon them, and send those to the superintendent of the folding room.

That is my own almost invariable usage, and I find it far more convenient than any other method. This language which was read, that Senators, Representatives, etc., shall send to the superintendent of documents on franked or other labels, or in lists, as they please, the names and addessses of those who shall receive documents, is simply a recognition in the law of a custom that now very largely obtains. If there is added to this section, at the end of line 21, the amendment that I read a moment ago, which recognizes that which I think would be anyhow without any such amendment, the right of a member to have all his documents sent in any way he pleases, then it seems to me that we have stripped from the bill the objectionable feature suggested by the Senator from Missouri. He can not go further than myself in denunciation of any officer of the Government who would convert to base political uses the privileges of his position. With him I condemn the action to which he has referred; but I do not see that this will lead into any such difficulty as that when you guard it in this method. I suggest that if it is the desire to prevent the duplication of public documents, to prevent speculation in them, then this provision of the law is desirable.

As to this particular amendment, I do not know that I have any special objection to it. I do not think it very particularly changes the language of the section, although I apprehend it is to be followed by other proposed changes.

Mr. VEST. The amendment simply inserts in this provision, transposing some of the words, the power for Members and Delegates and Senators to send their documents themselves instead of furnishing the orders for distribution to the superintendent.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is, it reaches the same idea in the proviso——

Mr. VEST. The same idea, but I thought it was more germane to put it in this section.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask the Secretary to read it as it would read if amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the clause as it would stand if amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

He shall have general supervision of the distribution of all public documents, and to his custody shall be committed all documents subject to distribution excepting those printed for the special official use of the Executive Departments, and those printed for the use of the two Houses of Congress, which are to be distributed or delivered ready for distribution on the order of Members and Delegates.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not feel warranted in accepting the amendment. Still I do not see that it changes particularly the idea of the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read section 63 of the bill to line 22.

Mr. VEST. That section must be amended, and I move——

Mr. MANDERSON. I propose to amend the section by adding to it the language I read. Perhaps under strict parliamentary practice this as a committee amendment would be first in order, but I am so anxious to perfect the bill as we go along as far as we can, that I certainly have no objection to the Senator introducing any amendment he may see fit, whether acceptable to the committee or not.

Mr. VEST. I was going to suggest after the word "sent," in line 7, to insert "when desired by Senators, Representatives, or Delegates;" so as to read:

All orders for the distribution of documents by Senators, Representatives, or Delegates, and Departments shall be sent, when desired by Senators, Representatives, or Delegates, to the superintendent of documents, etc.

So as to give them the option whether they will furnish the list or not.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear section 62 read as amended. I was called out just at the time the amendment was offered. Let it be read as it now stands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to have it read before the pending amendment is passed on?

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Section 62 will be read as it now stands.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 62. The President of the United States shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a superintendent of documents, who shall receive a salary of $3,000 per annum. He shall have general supervision of the distribution of all public documents, and to his custody shall be committed all documents subject to distribution, excepting those printed for the special official use of the Executive Departments and those printed for the use of the two Houses of Congress, which are to be distributed or delivered ready for distribution on the order of Members and Delegates.

Mr. COCKRELL. He shall have general supervision of the distribution of all public documents, as I understand it, "and to his custody shall be committed all documents subject to distribution."

Mr. VEST. "Excepting."

The SECRETARY. "Excepting those printed for the special official use of the Executive Departments."

Mr. VEST. "And."

The SECRETARY. "And those printed for the use of the two Houses of Congress, which are to be distributed or delivered ready for distribution on the order of Members and Delegates."

Mr. COCKRELL. It does not seem to me that that changes it.

Mr. VEST. Yes, it puts in the idea that they are to be delivered to anybody when ordered by Members and Delegates; that is, they are not absolutely required to be distributed by the superintendent. Of course if a member of Congress wants them to be distributed by the superintendent he can do so, but with this amendment it gives him the power to have them so distributed or not.

Mr. HARRIS. Had you not better incorporate in that amendment, after the word "distributed," the words "to Members and Delegates."

Mr. VEST. That is covered by the words "or delivered ready for." Let the Secretary read it again.

The Secretary read as follows:

Which are to be distributed or delivered ready for distribution on the order of Members and Delegates.

Mr. VEST. That is, with the franks upon them.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest that you say "to Members and Delegates upon their order."

Mr. VEST. I have no objection to that. That is the meaning.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course that I know to be the object, but I think it is more clearly expressed by that language.

Mr. VEST. Very well.

Mr. MANDERSON. Now let that part of the section be read as modified.

Mr. HARRIS. Let it read "to Members and Delegates upon their order."

The Secretary read as follows:

Which are to be distributed or delivered ready for distribution to Members and Delegates upon their order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be agreed to, if there be no objection. The amendment is agreed to. The question now is on the amendment proposed to section 63 by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. COCKRELL. Has any amendment been made to the first four lines of section 63?

Mr. MANDERSON. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment was offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] to section 63, which the Secretary will report.

The SECRETARY. In line 7, after the word "sent," insert the words "when desired by Senators, Representatives, or Delegates."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that that would make those sent to Departments dependent on the order of Senators and Members.

Mr. VEST. Let it read "sent to the Departments, or to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. MANDERSON. Let it be read.

Mr. VEST. Let the amendment be read again.

The Secretary read as follows:

All orders for the distribution of documents by Senators, Representatives, or Delegates, and Departments, shall be sent, when desired by Senators, Representatives, or Delegates, to the superintendent of documents on franked or other labels, etc.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think I can suggest an amendment instead of that which will reach the idea better. I suggest to make it read in this form:

When desired, all orders for the distribution of documents by Senators, Representatives, or Delegates, and orders from Departments, shall be sent to the superintendent of documents.

Mr. VEST. Yes, that is right; that covers it.

Mr. MANDERSON. Insert "when desired" at the commencement of line 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported as modified.

The SECRETARY. At the beginning of line 5 insert "when desired," and after the word "and," in line 6, insert "and orders from;" so as to read:

When desired, all orders for the distribution of documents by Senators, Representatives, or Delegates, and orders from Departments, shall be sent to the superintendent of documents, etc.

Mr. VEST. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now, let that part of the section be read following the amendment just agreed to.

The Secretary read as follows:

Shall be sent to the superintendent of documents on franked or other labels or in lists, which shall be kept confidential, and which shall give the name and address of each and every party to whom documents are ordered sent.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has any change been made in the remainder of the section?

Mr. MANDERSON. None whatever.

The Secretary read the remainder of section 63 and section 64.

Mr. MANDERSON. In section 64, lines 2 and 3, I move to strike out the words "the laws of the United States," and in line 3 to insert "otherwise" after "herein."

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator mean to give him the power of sale?

Mr. MANDERSON. No; the object is simply this: As the superintendent of documents has now the power of sale under the general law, this is a proposition to continue that power under the restrictions of the bill. But the laws of the United States have always been sold at the State Department. It seems desirable to continue that provision. When this bill was drafted we were rather of the impression that those were the only documents sold in any Department, but on investigation we find that mariners' charts and reports of the Coast and Geodetic Survey and other documents are sold. So I propose to say "except as herein otherwise provided."

Mr. COCKRELL. And in the Patent Office, too, they are sold.

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, sir. It will be found afterwards in the bill that we provide for the sale of certain documents by certain Departments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The SECRETARY. In line 2, of section 64, strike out the words "the laws of the United States," and after the word "herein," in line 3, insert "otherwise;" so as to read:

The superintendent of documents is also charged with the sale of public documents, except as herein otherwise provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read sections 65, 66, and 67.

Mr. MANDERSON. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of section 67. After "employés," in line 11, I move to insert "of his office." It was an omission in the bill that should have been inserted originally.

Mr. VEST. May I inquire of the Senator from Nebraska how many employés there are attached to this office now in the Interior Department?

Mr. MANDERSON. My recollection is that there are seven, that is, clerks, packers, folders, etc. I could answer definitely, by referring to the testimony of Mr. Ames; but my recollection is that there are seven employés in the office of the superintendent of documents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment moved by the Senator from Nebraska will be reported.

The SECRETARY. In section 67, line 11, after the word "employés," insert "of his office;" so as to read:

The superintendent of documents shall appoint all employés of his office authorized by Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read sections 68, 69, and 70.

Mr. MANDERSON. I offer an amendment to section 70, and I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to this proposed amendment, which is one of those curtailing power of which I spoke a moment ago.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment moved by the Senator from Nebraska will be reported.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 70 after the word "him," in line 28, in the following words:

In such manner as he deems best for the public good, preference being given to libraries and to the completion of broken sets and to lists that may be furnished to him by Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, to all of whom he shall deliver printed statements of the documents in his possession for such distribution.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

First, to public and school libraries for the purpose of completing broken sets; second, to public and school libraries that have not been supplied with any portion of such sets; and, third, to other parties, which persons and libraries shall be named to him by Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, and in this distribution the superintendent of documents shall see that, as far as possible, an equal allowance is made to each member of Congress.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read section 71, as follows:

SEC. 71. A catalogue of Government publications shall be prepared by the superintendent of documents on the first day of each month, which shall be printed in the Official Gazette of the Patent Office, and during sessions of Congress also in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and shall show the documents printed during the month, where obtainable, and the price thereof. On the 1st day of July of each year he shall prepare and print in pamphlet form for distribution and sale 2,000 copies of a catalogue of Government publications issued during the year, giving the price of each and where purchasable.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desire to call attention particularly to this section, which seems to the committee to be one that is very desirable. It reaches the remedy of an evil that has been frequently complained of. As will be seen by its wording, it proposes to publish at the end of each month the publications of the Government of all sorts during that month, where they are obtainable, and their price; and then annually, on the 1st day of July of each year, he prints in pamphlet form for distribution and sale 2,000 copies of a catalogue of Government publications issued during the year; and of course, in addition to this, under the general provisions of the law, the usual number of that catalogue would also be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator is sure that the usual number would be printed under that provision?

Mr. MANDERSON. I think so, because of the provision as to the usual number, to which I will turn, which provides that—

Whenever any document or report shall be ordered to be printed by Congress such order to print shall signify the usual number of copies, and when a special number of a document is ordered printed the usual number shall also be printed.

Mr. HAWLEY. Can the Senator give us an estimate of the number of titles that will be in such a catalogue? Has he any idea of the number of books?

Mr. MANDERSON. Published annually?

Mr. HAWLEY. The number that will enter into this monthly publication, the catalogue of Government publications?

Mr. MANDERSON. It will not take a very large space in either the Official Gazette or the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. As to the entire Congress, I find that in the first session of the Fifty-first Congress there were printed 136 documents, including reports; and at the second session 70, making a total of 206 in the Fifty-first Congress. That of course is only the Congressional publications. In addition to that would be the publications of the Departments. The annual pamphlet would not be a large one, and I do not think the monthly list would be a very large one.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not know how much expense it might add to the cost of the Official Gazette or RECORD.

Mr. MANDERSON. But a trifle, I think, because it is to be published but once a month.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest to the Senator in charge, the chairman of the committee, that an amendment ought to be put in there to require the printing of the list of Government publications to go back as far as 1881, anyway.

Mr. MANDERSON. I should be glad to do that, but I rather dislike to burden this bill with that matter.

Mr. COCKRELL. We have in the Descriptive Catalogue of Government Publications a pretty fair list, although not as systematically and properly arranged as it ought to be. We have a fair list of the publications from the foundation of the Government up to that time, and now we commence after the passage of this bill with another publication. Here is an interregnum between them, and it would certainly be very important that we should have the list of publications since 1881 included in his first annual report.

Mr. MANDERSON. I quite agree with the Senator on that proposition, but I should greatly prefer that that should be by concurrent resolution of the two Houses after this general bill shall have passed. When the superintendent of documents is in his place as a creation of Congress there will be no trouble about directing him in that regard by concurrent resolution. I feel that this bill has already in it so much that may excite adverse criticism elsewhere, that I should be glad not to enter into any new field of operations. I quite agree, though, with the object the Senator has in view, and if this bill shall pass I certainly will make an effort in that direction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The Secretary read section 72, as follows:

SEC. 72. When extra numbers in excess of 5,000 of any document shall be ordered by Congress, there shall be delivered to the superintendent of documents 500 copies, to be taken ratably from the two Houses of Congress, and where less than 5,000 extra numbers are ordered the superintendent shall receive 10 per cent of the number. Said copies shall be distributed by the superintendent of documents to free public libraries having more than 1,000 volumes, other than Government publications, which have not been designated as depositories, preference being given to those named by Senators, Representatives, and Delegates.

Mr. MANDERSON. I should like to explain that provision. Under the existing law, which is continued in principle in this bill, each member of Congress designates two libraries and depositories, and for a long time all pubic documents subject to distribution have been sent to these libraries and also to all State and Territorial libraries. The number now is 496 of the designated depositories and the State and Territorial libraries. There has been an enormous pressure brought to bear by other libraries not designated depositories that they shall receive Government publications, and petitions have been placed on file here from libraries throughout the country insisting that the Government publications should be sent to every school and every public library in the United States. Of course that can not be done. They are usually reached by the distribution of members of Congress from their quota.

But here is an effort to place in these libraries other than the designated depositories the more valuable of the Government publications, to wit, those that are published by the special order of Congress, and we provide that where there is an excess of 5,000 copies of any document, 500 copies shall be turned over to the superintendent of documents, to be sent by him to libraries other than designated depositories, and if the number is less than 5,000 extra copies, then he shall receive 10 per cent of the whole number that is to be distributed by Congress. That, then, will enable school and public libraries other than designated depositories to receive what may be termed the cream of the Government publications, and it seems to me that it is a very desirable provision to enact.

Mr. COCKRELL. It seems to me that the operation of that provision would be not an impartial but a partial distribution; that while members of Congress from certain districts would get their full share, the sparsely settled and thin districts would be deprived of their portion of them, not having the libraries there.

Mr. MANDERSON. But the Senator will notice the preference——

Mr. COCKRELL. I am perfectly willing to furnish these libraries, but I do not want to do it at the expense of those localities that have not so many libraries.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Senator will notice the latter part of the section provides that preference is to be given to libraries named by Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in this instance, as in all others.

Mr. COCKRELL. There are many places where there are no established libraries of over a thousand volumes. For example, in Missouri we have in many of our towns what we call a public library, but the public building has not been built specifically with reference to a library room, and they commence their collections from the patrons of the office, and they may not have a thousand volumes there.

Mr. MANDERSON Those can be supplied from the quota of members from that district or the Senator from that State.

Mr. COCKRELL. But wherever you have those libraries they get the bulk of these 500 copies and the member of Congress from such district also gets the same number, so that it is giving to the localities that have libraries the excess in number. That is the only point. I do not know how you can avoid that. It nevertheless has that result.

Mr. MANDERSON. It seems to me that there is the demand, and there is where the supply should go. The more libraries, the more books are necessary. If there are no libraries in any member's district, then he had better establish some that will receive these publications.

The Secretary read section 73, as follows:

SEC. 73. The superintendent of documents shall thoroughly investigate the condition of all libraries that are now designated depositories, and whenever he shall ascertain that the number of books in any such library is below one thousand, other than Government publications, or it has ceased to be maintained as a free public library, he shall strike the same from the list, and the Senator, Representative, or Delegate shall designate another depository that shall meet the conditions herein required.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think perhaps the word "public" should be stricken out in line 6, after the word "free." I have had a little disturbance of mind about it. I do not desire, if there is a library among the designated depositories that is not open to the public to take out books, that it should be expunged from the list. For instance, some of the college libraries, reference libraries, as is suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], are free libraries; but I do not know that they can be called free public libraries, because they do not permit their publications to be taken from the library building or room.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is in line 6 of section 73?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes; in line 6 of the section. The question in my mind is whether the word "public" had not better be stricken out, so as to read, "or it has ceased to be maintained as a free library," instead of "a free public library." I will make that motion. I move to strike out the word "public," so that there shall be no question about it.

The SECRETARY. In line 6, section 73, after the word "free," it is proposed to strike out the word "public;" so as to read:

As a free library.

Mr. KYLE. I should like to ask a question as to the probable meaning, in case the word "public" were stricken out. I have made inquiry since a conversation with the Senator from Nebraska, and I believe it is the rule with college libraries to throw them open free to all students; but it would be impossible almost in college towns to throw these libraries open to the public from the fact that a large number of citizens would flock in around the tables, so that the students would be deprived of the special privilege which properly belongs to them. I should like to have the section so amended, whether by this word or by some other means, that college libraries will be excepted from the list.

Mr. MANDERSON. If the Senator will permit an interruption, that was my purpose in moving to strike out the word "public." It was to reach the very idea that he has in mind. A free library, as I understand it, would be one that makes no charge for the use of its books. I do not understand that any college library does that, none at least within my knowledge. I think to strike out the word "public" will reach the idea that he has in mind. However, I shall be very glad to accept any suggestion or amendment that he may wish to make.

Mr. KYLE. I have thought of an amendment at the end of the section in perhaps this form:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to college libraries.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not object to that amendment.

Mr. KYLE. I will move, then, that provision at the close of the section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the section:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to college libraries.

Mr. COCKRELL. That it shall not apply to them; that they shall not have the benefit of the section?

Mr. MANDERSON. I am a little afraid the Senator from South Dakota would defeat the college libraries by his amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think you would exclude them utterly by that proviso.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not think there is any difficulty about my amendment as it stands.

Mr. KYLE. Construing the interpretation given to the word free by the Senator from Nebraska, I will withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska, to strike out the word "public" after "free," in line 6.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read section 74, as follows:

SEC. 74. All documents in excess of 25 copies of any one publication remaining in the folding room of the Senate or House at the expiration of two years, after being placed to the credit of a Senator or Representative or Delegate, shall be turned over to the superintendent of documents for distribution by him to public libraries or depositories or for sale, as in his judgment shall best subserve the public interest.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senate will pass that section by for the present. I shall certainly want to offer an amendment to it.

I regard it very fatal that there should be a compulsory law requiring a Senator to distribute inside of two years when his term is six years any publication he may receive or forfeit it. We are having illustrations of that policy not enforced by law. We had what is known as the Rebellion Record. Five volumes are issued. They have been scattered to the four winds, and now we commence the distribution of all after the five volumes by the War Department, and we have to print five more volumes to make up the set. Take the Medical and Surgical History of the War of the Rebellion. That came out in installments. It was about fifteen years from the time the first volume was issued until the last one was issued. A Senator was compelled, say, to distribute that, and it is distributed to this one and that one. Fortunately or unfortunately, I kept mine; I did not distribute them when they were first issued. The result is that I have been able to complete a great many more sets than I possibly could have done if I had distributed them as they came out from time to time.

I think such a provision ought not particularly to apply to a Senator. We have books that are coming out in sets. The first volume will be printed and it may be some time before the set will be completed. If a Senator commences distributing them, and he is compelled to do it inside of a certain time, when the other volumes come out a large number of the persons he distributed the first volume to may have gone out of his State, or they may be dead, and he may not want to send them. He sends a copy of the second volume to some one, and he immediately writes back and wants the first volume; and so the volumes are broken up, and there is no complete set of them anywhere.

I think it would be very detrimental in the distribution of public documents to require that a Senator should distribute them all and clean out his room within two years when his term is six years.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I rose for the purpose of asking the Senator in charge of the bill if he did not think it would be wise to adjourn at this time, and give the Senator from Missouri an opportunity to prepare the amendments to this section which he wishes to submit.

Mr. MANDERSON. I certainly have no objection to the proposition to adjourn, but I think that after full thought and prayerful consideration of this section the Senator from Missouri will not desire to amend it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know I shall insist upon amending it to the bitterest end. I would regard it as really a calamity for a bill to be passed compelling a Senator to distribute all his documents within two years, regardless of what the documents are.

Mr. MANDERSON. So would I. That is not the proposition of this section.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is just this bill the way it is now.

Mr. HARRIS. With the permission of the Senator from Nebraska, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 4, 1892, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were severally referred as follows:

A bill (S. 2) for the relief of Ezra S. Havens—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. 3) for the relief of Napoleon B. Giddings—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. 4) for the relief of Alfred J. Worcester—to the Committee on War Claims.

A bill (S. 591) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Grand Forks, N. Dak.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. 606) to amend and enlarge the act approved June 18, 1878, entitled "An act to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico, concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868"—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HALLOWELL, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for one week, on account of sickness.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WARWICK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 1762) for the relief of the University of the State of Missouri;

A bill (H. R. 2785) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the general incorporation law of the District of Columbia," approved May 17, 1882; and

A bill (H. R. 3931) to detach Montgomery County from the western and add it to the eastern district of Arkansas.

THE RULES.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I call up for consideration the report of the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BOATNER moved to amend paragraph 3, Rule XXI, by striking out all the paragraph after the word "order" in line 6; so that it will read:

"No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order."

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], in addressing himself to this amendment yesterday, inquired of me if I was opposed to the retrenchment of the expenses of the Government and to the reforms which this Congress is expected to inaugurate and carry out. I reply, Mr. Speaker, that I am not opposed to any proper retrenchment in public expenditures, to any necessary and proper reduction of salaries, or of the expenses of the Government in any direction, provided such measures be accomplished in the proper way. But I am radically and totally opposed to the principle which is involved in this rule, of coercing the judgment of this House, or of coercing the judgment of a coördinate branch of Congress, so as to compel them to support a measure which does not commend itself to their judgment because it is attached to a bill which is necessary to be passed in order to carry on the Government. I apprehend, sir, that every measure which passes this House ought to rest on the untrammeled judgment of every member who votes for it, and no member ought to be put in the dilemma of being obliged to support a measure which does not commend itself to his judgment, because its defeat will carry with it a failure of the appropriations necessary to carry on the Government.

But, Mr. Speaker, the argument which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] have addressed to this House, based upon the reduction of appropriations to which they refer, is purely fallacious, as will appear upon a simple inspection of the appropriations made by the Congresses from the Forty-third to the Fiftieth Congress. I call particular attention to the figures which I propose to give. The total appropriations of the Forty-third Congress were $653,794,000 in round figures; the total appropriations of the Forty-fourth Congress were $595,597,000 in round figures, a decrease of about $58,000,000, which the gentlemen attribute to the adoption at that time of the rule which is now under consideration, which is known as the "Holman amendment."

But, Mr. Speaker, it is significant that, the same rule being adopted in the Forty-fifth Congress, the appropriations of that Congress exceeded the appropriations of the Forty-fourth Congress by nearly $109,000,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. The modified rule was adopted at that Congress—the modified rule as now before us.

Mr. BOATNER. I understand the gentleman to say that the rule now before us was adopted in the Forty-fifth Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is my recollection.

Mr. BOATNER. Well, under the operation of the rule which the gentleman now proposes to have the House adopt the appropriations of the Forty-fifth Congress were increased over those of the Forty-fourth by nearly $109,000,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. But I favored the original rule. I have only accepted this because other gentlemen will not go any farther.

Mr. BOATNER. It is not the original rule that we have before us.

Mr. HOLMAN. I know that.

Mr. BOATNER. Now, we find that the Forty-sixth Congress increased the appropriations of the Forty-fifth Congress by $23,000,000; that the Forty-seventh Congress increased the appropriations of their predecessors by $49,000,000.

Now we come to the great reduction brought about in the Forty-eighth Congress, when the provision now under discussion was again incorporated in the rules. The appropriations of the Forty-eighth Congress were $655,269,000 as against $777,435,000 appropriated by its predecessor.

But, Mr. Speaker, the Forty-eighth Congress utilized an unexpended balance of appropriations for pensions made by the Forty-seventh Congress, amounting to $66,000,000. The Forty-seventh Congress appropriated for pensions $202,000,000, and then they were only $49,000,000 ahead of the preceding Congress. When the Forty-eighth Congress came to make its appropriations it found that $66,000,000 of the appropriations made by the Forty-seventh Congress for pensions had been unexpended. Therefore the Forty-seventh Congress is entitled to a credit of those $66,000,000, which should be charged to the appropriations of the Forty-eighth Congress, and thus the amount of the reduction in the latter would be decreased to the extent of $66,000,000.

Then, sir, we find when we come to the Forty-ninth Congress that it increased the appropriations of the Forty-eighth Congress by $91,000,000. Now, mind you, Mr. Speaker, in the Forty-eighth Congress the rule which is now under consideration, proposed by the gentleman from Indiana, was in force. We find——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RICHARDSON). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Louisiana be extended for five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. BOATNER. We find, Mr. Speaker, that the Forty-ninth Congress appropriated $746,342,000 in round numbers, being an increase of $91,000,000 over the appropriations made by the Forty-eighth Congress, and that the Fiftieth Congress, in which it was not in force, only increased the appropriations of its predecessor by about $71,000,000, lacking $20,000,000 of the increase made by the preceding Congress. So that without the rule in question the Forty-ninth Congress was able to effect a reduction, or a saving, in public expenditures of $20,000,000 over its predecessor, and without the aid of the rule in question.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is pure fallacy to attribute the reductions thus made to the operation of this rule. It is pure fallacy to say that the increase in the expenses of this Government has been brought about by an increase of the salaries or an increase in the amounts paid for public services of that kind. It has been due to the increase of the appropriations for pensions, to the increase in the river and harbor appropriations, to the increases for the erection of public buildings throughout the country, to the increase of money devoted to the rectification and improvements of harbors like the harbor at Galveston and the harbor at New York and others; and the increase is not attributable, except in a very slight degree, to the amounts paid to the employés of the Government and to the officers of the Government. The salaries of the people who serve this Government are a comparatively small item of its aggregate expenditures.

The adoption of this rule, therefore, is practically a declaration that we are afraid to trust ourselves to legislate as the public interests require. It is provided in the rule that the Committee on Appropriations may put independent legislation into the appropriation bills, provided such legislation is in the line of reduction. The gentleman from Indiana wants to know if there is an unnecessary officer who is drawing a salary from the Government, whether they ought not to have the right to abolish that office, or if there is an excessive salary paid to any one of the Government employés, whether they should not also have the right to decrease this salary?

I answer certainly. But exactly on the same principle should there be the converse right. If there is a necessary office, we ought to have the right to create it; or if there is an insufficient salary, we ought to have the right to raise the compensation; or if there is no appropriation made for a necessary item of expenditure, we ought to have the right to provide the appropriation.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOATNER. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. How do you propose to reach a reduction?

Mr. BOATNER. We propose to reach it by legislation directed to that special object; legislation coming from the appropriate committee and submitted to the judgment of the House.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then one other question. What will become of your special act in the Senate when it gets there?

Mr. BOATNER. I will answer the gentleman by stating that I am not concerned with what the acts of the Senate will be; if I have attended to my own business I have done my whole duty. There is just the mistake that gentlemen fall into. They not only want to attend to the business they are sent here by their constituents to attend to, but they want also to attend to the business of the Senate. I should like to know where the gentleman or any other gentleman gets his authority to assume that the Senate of the United States is not actuated by the same motives that we are. I should like to know where he gets his authority to assume that the Senate of the United States is not coequally responsible with us for legislation of Congress. But he assumes that we have the right to force on the Senate the views we entertain on such matters, and compel their acceptance.

I will say to the gentleman now, as I said to the gentleman from Indiana on yesterday, that we may, under the programme proposed here, reduce inconsiderable salaries of Government offices; we may refuse to pay those who have claims against the Government, which is but a trifle to us but is of very great importance to them; we may deny to the individual the relief which should be accorded to him in justice, and it will not be of any consequence in the Senate. It will be unnoticed by that body, and not interfere with the passage of our bills. But if we undertake to attach anything of importance to our appropriation bills which does not recommend itself to the judgment of the Senate, that body will refuse to acquiesce, and it must come back here to the House, and the House must recede from its position.

I say, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, that a recapitulation of the figures, a review of the appropriations made by all the Congresses from the Forty-fourth Congress down to the present time, show that this check upon the independence of the House and its right to execute its will has not had the effect gentlemen claim that it had, and that we may constitutionally and lawfully reduce expenditures without depriving ourselves of the right to vote as we choose on all of these questions, and not as directed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Besides, sir, the kind of economy advocated by the the gentlemen who urge the adoption of this rule, is not economy in the true sense of the term.

It is not proposed to relieve the people of the burden of taxation, but to hoard the money after its collection.

The millions temporarily saved by reduction of appropriations did not relieve a single citizen of the burden of government to the least extent, and only created a great hoard of money in the Treasury. After money is taken from the citizen by taxation it is better that it should be judiciously expended than hoarded and kept out of circulation. The insignificant reduction of salaries, mounting in totals to a few thousand dollars, certainly is not of sufficient importance to justify us in conferring such extraordinary powers upon any committees of this House.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Speaker, this section 3 of Rule XXI may be taken as embodying the Democratic scheme of retrenchment and reform. Now, if the Democratic party want to reform, no one should object. They have been telling us about it for the last ten or fifteen years, and undoubtedly the party needs to reform. As for myself, I have had the good fortune to be connected with a party that does not have to be under the disagreeable necessity, every time an election comes round or is approaching, of promising to reform. A gentleman on the other side yesterday propounded the question, "What are we here for?" Well, I do not know what he is here for, but I suppose for the same reason I am here, namely, to represent his constituents. As for me, I do not feel that I need any reform. I do not want any, so far as I am concerned, and do not need any. I am not here to sound the praises of retrenchment either.

I am not here, Mr. Speaker, to retrench. I came here to represent the people who sent me here, to try to obtain what they want and what they asked for, and I am going to ask for it. I will tell you, I know what they want. They want reasonable appropriations to make needed improvements for their rivers and harbors. They want necessary public buildings; they want, more than anything perhaps, a reasonable appropriation for the survey of unsurveyed lands, that settlers there may secure title to their homes. They want another thing. They want the United States to return to those settlers the $1.25 per acre they paid in excess of the usual price of public lands, on the promise that there would be a railroad built which was never built. They now want the United States to return the money that is being kept from them and which the United States is not entitled to keep, the money which is due to these settlers. They want the United States to be honest, if we do have to make appropriations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have a great many good Democratic friends. I have so many that I have come to love the Democrats; not all of them, of course, for no man can do that; but a great many of them. Their hearts are all right. They get wrong in their heads sometimes. But it is by reason of this love and affection that I bear so many of them that I want to give them the straight tip on this race for the Presidential stakes. You see, Mr. Speaker, I am going to get right down to the real question at issue. Gentlemen have been skirmishing around it, but they have not faced it yet, and that is the question. We are all scoring up for that race. And now I want to give you a straight tip. Gentlemen, you are putting this race up wrong, and I will tell you that if you are going to win it or have any show to win it you have got to change your blacksmith.

Now, if you attempt to shoe the nag that you put in on that race with five-cent nickels instead of putting on his hoofs good, sound, sensible, modern horseshoes, you "won't be in it," I can tell you that. [Laughter on the Republican side.] One of my Democratic friends yesterday expressed the belief that after the 4th of March, 1893, there would be a Democrat in the Presidential chair, a Democratic Senate, and a Democratic House. Now I want to give you gentlemen what I believe to be a straight tip on that. You can not win with the hand you hold; you have got to draw and fill or you will be beaten. [Laughter.] That is the fact. Now I will tell you gentlemen, the man or the party that takes a five-cent nickel piece——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RICHARDSON in the chair). The time of the gentleman has expired.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey and of Mr. MCKENNA, by unanimous consent, the time of Mr. BOWERS was extended five minutes.

Mr. BOWERS. Gentlemen, I would like to larrup my Democratic friends about five minutes more, not in a mean way, but mildly. I want to say that the man or the party that takes a five-cent nickel piece as the measure of the American people, their ambitions, their hopes, and their pride, makes a mistake, and you will find that out, and you will tell me so when I meet you next winter. Now you can never roll your Presidential candidate into the White House on a chariot of reform that has five-cent nickels for wheels. You can not do it. Just as soon as the Democratic party show to this country that they are big enough and broad enough, that they realize that the country has grown, that it requires more cloth now to cover it than when it was an infant, that the family has increased, that you have got to build the house bigger, that you have got to build the barns bigger, that you are working more land, as soon as you give a guaranty to the people of the United States that you will be devoted to the honor, the prosperity, and the growth of this country, just so soon you will have a chance. When that time comes nobody can object to your taking all these places.

Now, in conclusion, I have only one more item to speak to you about and that is this: I can not speak for the Democrats of these States. I am not entitled to, but I can speak for the Democrats of two Congressional districts for whom I stand on this floor, because I know them and want to tell you that they are broad-minded, they are progressive, they are patriotic, they are devoted to the honor of this country, and they are proud of it. They are not small. Why, gentlemen, when you go fishing for people of that kind you must use some other sort of bait than a five-cent nickel. That may do in Indiana, but it will not catch any fish in California or on the Pacific coast, and you can bet on it. You have got to find a bigger bait and a better bait. You talk about the billion-dollar Congress. Do you not know that every American is proud of the billion-dollar Congress.

Why, if it had not been for that you could not have sent an ultimatum to the Indians of Patagonia. [Laughter.] You all know that.

Now, gentlemen, I have given you a little good advice, and I hope you will take it, and let us have a good, liberal Congress. Let us give the people what they want us to give them, and what they require. I have a good Democratic editor down in my district who spoke of the good intentions of BOWERS and Senator FELTON, and alluded to that place the approach to which is said to be paved with good intentions. I told him that the only place of that kind that BOWERS and FELTON need to be afraid of was the Democratic House of retrenchment and reform. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a very important amendment. I had the honor of serving in the Forty-fourth Congress with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who has offered this amendment, or rather who is the advocate of it, and I remember the resistance made then on the other side of the House to this same rule, and for the same reason that it meets opposition to-day—that was, to prevent the Democratic majority from reducing the expenditures of the Government. As has been stated by the gentleman from Indiana in his opening remarks on this question, under a rule similar to this—I believe identical with this rule—we did accomplish a reduction of $60,000,000. But gentlemen say that we propose to accomplish these reductions by coercing the Senate. The Senate at that time was Republican. It is to-day.

I do not care whether gentlemen use the word "coerce" or any other word that will have the meaning of compelling the Senate to agree to a reduction of expenditures. Have not the people the right even to use the word "coerce" to compel the Senate to a reduction of the expenditures of this Government? We are all supposed to be amenable to coercion by the people of this Government. The Senate has no power to originate appropriation bills or revenue bills. The Constitution reserved that right to the people and their representatives, and the Senate must first take the judgment of this House upon appropriation bills. Certainly the people can coerce the Senate into respect for the judgment of the will of the people who have to pay these taxes.

The Constitution contemplates that this body must, in the first instance, pass judgment upon these appropriations, while the Senate have the power to amend and the right to insist. Yet under the Constitution and our theory of government the rights of the people in the first instance is given to the House to originate these measures; and when gentlemen undertake to say that the Senate ought not to yield to the representatives of the people in any fair means of reduction of expenditures contemplated, it means that the Senate must set itself up as autocrat over the House of Representatives.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] yesterday stated that he was opposed to putting political riders on appropriation bills. Gentlemen undertake to assume here that a reduction of expenditures and economy is a political question in this House. This side of the House has assumed an aggressive attitude on the question of economy. The Democratic party is the only political party in this country that demands economy and retrenchment in the expenditures, and the only riders which we propose are riders in the interest of economy.

If that is a political rider, the people of this country will, in my opinion, sustain any party that insists upon riding down the expenditures of this Government. There is no other way of reaching and reducing the expenditures.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to increase the gentleman's time by five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana that the time of the gentleman from Missouri be extended five minutes? The Chair hears none.

Mr BLAND. Now, what was the result of adopting this rule in the Forty-fourth Congress? Not only did the Democratic party reduce these expenditures and keep them down, but the Republican party itself was compelled afterwards, in order to make a creditable record, to keep nearly within the limits of Democratic expenditures until the last Congress. That has been the history of the matter. Gentlemen talk about introducing bills here in order to reduce the number of offices and their pay. You would never hear of one of those bills passing the Senate until the time for this Congress to adjourn. Where would reduction then be? Most of these expenditures have been riders on appropriation bills in the interest of extravagance, and have been put on by the Senate; and we propose in the interest of the people to put riders on appropriation bills in the interest of economy, so as to meet the extravagant rules of the Senate, who put riders on in the interest of the flagrant violation of every principle of economy and in favor of extravagance.

If this House proposes to reduce expenditures it must adopt a rule for that purpose. It is very difficult for the House to reduce expenditures all along the line unless we reduce the demand for the money; unless we limit the number of officers and the pay to them, or wherever a salary may be in excess to reduce it.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is the duty of this House, if it is possible to do so, to reduce the expenditures of this Government from $75,000,000 to $100,000,000 during the first session, and especially during the last session of this Congress.

A billion dollars for two years, one-half of which is $500,000,000. That absorbs and takes from the circulating medium of this country nearly one-half of the money in circulation within twelve months which is piled up in the Treasury.

We are demanding a reduction of taxation, and why reduce taxation unless you are going to reduce the expenditures? What will it brook the American people if we reduce taxation and yet keep up our expenditures until we make a deficit in the Federal Treasury and have to meet it with increased taxation?

Reduction of taxes and the reduction of appropriations of the revenues must go hand in hand, or else all our talk about economy will be of no avail. This is a fair rule—a rule by which the judgment of the House may be taken upon abolishing any office, or reducing the pay of any official, or repealing laws requiring the unnecessary expenditure of public money, and unless a rule is adopted giving the House that power, we can not succeed. With this rule we did succeed in the Forty-fourth Congress, and with this rule we can succeed again; but without it, Mr. Speaker, all our professions of economy and all our promises to reduce expenditures will simply go for naught.

PRINTING FOR THE COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. PEEL, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be authorized to have printed and bound such public documents as may be necessary in connection with the Indian appropriation bills for the Fifty-second Congress.

THE RULES.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, you may be well assured that under ordinary circumstances the practice of placing riders upon appropriation bills is not in harmony with sound policy. It frequently has the effect of compelling members to vote for things for which they do not desire to vote; but, on the other hand, it has frequently had the effect of carrying measures that were for the benefit of the people. I can well understand why our friends on the Republican side should be opposed to "riders" upon appropriation bills in the present House, and I can understand, too, why they were indifferent to them in the Fifty-first Congress.

The Fifty-first Congress was Republican in the House and Republican in the Senate, and there was a President who would sign all Republican measures; consequently they were able to follow the rule of sound policy upon the question of "riders," having no interest of any kind or character to conflict with it. But, sir, riders upon appropriation bills have time and again saved the liberties of the people. It was by the use of such measures that the liberties of the English people were established. When the Kings of England attempted to govern the country regardless of the laws, and when the Parliaments were called together and asked for appropriations to carry on the Government, it was by adopting the policy of engrafting upon their appropriation bills some great public measure concerning the rights of the people that the English people were finally able to establish and maintain their liberties.

It was the exercise of a power of this character by the House of Commons that brought Charles I to the block. It was the use of such a power in the reign of William and Mary that finally established the supremacy of the English Parliament in the English constitutional system. But our own history, within recent years, has furnished striking illustrations of the beneficial use of this power. In the year 1874 an election was held in the State of Louisiana, at which a Democratic Legislature was elected by an overwhelming majority, a Legislature which William A. Wheeler and William Walter Phelps, two prominent Republicans, afterwards pronounced to have been elected as a Democratic Legislature; but under the rule of President Grant the Army of the United States was called into use and the Democratic Legislature of Louisiana was driven at the point of the bayonet from the legislative halls of that State. Afterwards, when it was found that there was no way of preventing the use of troops at the polls in the South, and when it was found that the Army was being maintained for the purpose of upholding the carpetbag governments at the South, what did the Democratic House of Representatives do? They placed a "rider" upon the appropriation bill for the Army, providing that no money appropriated by that bill should be used for the benefit of the Army for troops at the polls or troops interfering with the constituted authority of any State. But that is not all that has come to pass here through this use of riders upon appropriation bills. In 1876 we had a disputed Presidential election. There was a contest after the election had been determined at the polls, after the ballots had been cast, and a similar state of affairs arose in Louisiana. There were the people upon one side and a few carpetbaggers, adventurers, and the military upon the other.

Again the same means were resorted to by the House of Representatives with the same result. And that policy was maintained until to-day, not only in the South but in the East, in the West, and in the North, no soldier can be employed by any means or in any manner to interfere with an election that is being conducted by the American people. But that is not all that has been accomplished by placing riders upon appropriation bills. To that policy we owe it that the Democrats of the South have a chance to be represented upon Federal juries. To that policy we owe it that the power has been taken away from partisan clerks in Federal courts to select partisan jurors to try their enemies. Therefore, I say, Mr. Speaker, that while I do not think it is a sound policy generally, nevertheless, the present circumstances, the present situation, will justify it. Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I believe in the Committee on Rules. I rely upon their wisdom and their judgment, and I appeal to every Democrat in this House to stand by them unitedly, and pass their code of rules as soon as as we conveniently can. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, as an original proposition, I would feel that it would be my duty to oppose riders on appropriation bills; but I am controlled largely by the thought that public interest always should be suggestive of public duty. When we determine for ourselves what the people of this country sent us here for, then carrying out the wishes of those people requires on our part the adoption of such methods as will make the duty which we aim at possible of achievement.

There is a difference between constitutional power and moral right. We have a power under the Constitution to expend large sums of money; we have constitutional power to establish two hundred thousand offices instead of one hundred thousand, if we choose. We have the power to expend millions upon millions for the payment of these salaries. But the power to do a thing does not carry with it the moral right to do it. We have no right to expend the money of this Government for any other purpose than for carrying out the duties of the Government economically administered. And ridicule or anything of that kind will not change my right or your right in the premises. The Constitution may define our powers, but our duties are to be decided wholly by the dictates of conscience and the rules of common honesty. The application of such rules makes for us the decision that economy is our duty in all affairs in which our public actions are called for as members of this House. Extravagance must be stopped, and frugality must, in this House, be the motto of all our actions.

If we have determined, therefore, that economy is the duty of the members of this House, then it becomes our bounden duty to adopt such methods as will make economy possible. The older members of this House have learned by experience what the new members must know as the result of reason or by faith in the statements of the older members—that retrenchment and reform have been in the past and are now impossible unless we have something more than the ordinary methods of legislation, whereby each measure is considered by itself. There is no question as to the constitutional power of this House to legislate in the proposed manner. The Constitution provides what we may legislate about, but not at all in regard to the method of such legislation. And it is our duty to our constituents to adopt the method that makes it possible to render economy a practical thing in this Government of the United States.

The adoption of the provision reported by the Committee on Rules will make it possible to so legislate as to save money to the people, and because of that I approve this report of the Committee on Rules, and hope it will be adopted without change. It would be foolish for us to say that we believe in retrenchment and reform, and then to throw from our hands every power that is given us to do the thing that we most desire to do. We desire retrenchment; let us have a rule which will make retrenchment possible.

Mr. MCKENNA. Mr. Speaker, I oppose this provision of the proposed rules on account of its ambiguity; for in its ambiguity there is a vast magazine of undefined power—the very thing, by the way, which the Democratic party has declared and declaimed against since its existence. Money, the expenditure of money, is the strength and vital point of almost all legislation. Therefore, under this provision almost every law can either be repealed or paralyzed. Besides, Mr. Speaker, is the reduction of expenditures to be direct, palpably to be seen? And who is to be the judge? It is common experience that none are so blind as those who will not see; and interest can always seem to see the things it does not. Let loose this provision, and then what restraint is there upon it except the varying and various discretion of Speakers of the House and Chairmen of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Speaker, I object to the provision for another reason. It inverts the principles of legislation. It promotes a secondary and subordinate principle into a primary and paramount one. The object of government, it is said, is not saving, it is well-being; and government does wisely and well if it expends adequately to that end. Economy is not hoarding; it is management. The justification for every dollar that you put into the Treasury is to put it out again in wise expenditure for the public good. And, going back to the sources of revenue, you are faced with the same principle, that government must consult the well-being of its citizens.

I object to the provision for still another reason. It is the last straw that breaks the back of the individual member on the floor of this House. It subordinates the member entirely; and by a kind of exquisite satire does not allow him to move at all in the interests of his constituents unless he goes one step lower down in their ruin, by following a committee or the gentleman from Indiana.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCKENNA. I would like to say just a few words further.

Several MEMBERS. Go on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes.

Mr. MCKENNA. I do not know that I shall occupy that much time.

There being no objection, Mr. MCKENNA'S time was extended.

Mr. MCKENNA. Mr. Speaker, I came into the Forty-ninth Congress a new member. I was attentive to its debates. It impressed what the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] would call my "untutored mind." I really believed, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen who rose upon the floor and uttered sentiments here actually meant them; that they were not only temporarily sincere, but intended to be everlastingly sincere. Among others the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] impressed me by his earnest, vehement manner, and, I have no doubt, sincerity. On that occasion he was emphatically and distinctly against the adoption of this rule. And the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] voted against it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am confronted with the fact that these gentlemen have changed their minds. I wish to show what the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] stated on that occasion. He made quite a long speech and a good one. I only wish I had time to reproduce it all to the House. He said:

I do not believe the question of economy is half so large in connection with this question as it would appear from some arguments pressed upon this House. I believe that the rule which has been so frequently cited—

That is the rule now under consideration—has served its purpose and had its day; that all legislation on appropriation bills will be hurtful.

Now the gentleman advocates the rule for some reason or other and believes it will be very beneficial. What change has occurred to the gentleman or to the country to make legislation so hurtful then beneficial and desirable now?

He said further:

The only method of correction, in my judgment, is to prevent on the part of any committee legislation upon appropriation bills, and to give committees charged with legislation in reference to great matters of public interest the right to come before this House and have these interests considered.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said about all I care to say on this question. I am not ambitious enough to suppose, that by my remarks, I can defeat the adoption of this measure; but I can at least put these few objections on record, objections original with myself, and some original with the gentleman from Georgia. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, when my colleague from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] was on the floor, the question was asked him how could expenses be reduced by this Congress unless this proposed amendment to the rules was adopted? I find, on looking over the debates which occurred in the Forty-ninth Congress, that the same question was asked by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] of Mr. Morrison of Illinois, then a member of this House.

This question was asked by the gentlemen from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]:

How does he propose to accomplish the object of reducing the number of employés or the amount of salaries if he shuts off every opportunity to make amendments on the only bills reasonably certain to become law?

To that question the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Morrison] replies:

I shut off nothing—no opportunity. Why, sir, any of these committees having charge of any particular department, service, or branch of the public service, if they find that the expenditures are extravagant and beyond what is just and right, beyond what the public service requires, more than reasonable compensation, will have the right to bring in a bill to meet the case.

* * * * * * * *

When any such bill is presented here and passed, is there a member of this House who honestly believes that any Senator of the majority will stand in the way of such reduction? Not one. Why should they?

Then the gentleman from Indiana said:

I predict that if you set up this barrier against economy there will not be the reduction of the salary of a solitary employé of the Government.

To which the gentleman from Illinois replied:

There is no barrier. The gentleman assumes that nobody is going to serve the public and the public interest but a member of that committee of which he has been so long an important part.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it has been stated repeatedly on the floor of this House that the principle of riders upon appropriation bills is a bad one. It is well known to almost every member on this floor that many of the States of the Union have by their constitutions absolutely prohibited a bill from containing more than one subject. Therefore, I ask, why it is necessary for us now in control of this body by a Democratic majority greater than for years past, and perhaps than ever before, why it is necessary to resort to the adoption of such a proposition as this. It was not adopted at all until the Forty-fourth Congress. It was tried up to the Forty-ninth Congress and abolished; many of the same distinguished gentlemen who voted for its adoption in the Forty-fourth Congress voting against it in the Forty-ninth. Such men as Mr. MILLS, Mr. Morrison, Mr. BLAND, and many other prominent members who could be named, voted against it. I can not now see any reason whatever for its adoption. We have the power to pass any bill we think proper. We can send it to the Senate, and if the Senate reject it and refuse to permit it to become a law they are responsible for the failure, and not the Democratic House of Representatives.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish my friend from Louisiana to understand that as far as I am concerned I am not satisfied with this rule as it now stands; it does not go as far as I wish in authorizing legislation for retrenchment on appropriation bills, but for the present I accept the decision of the Committee on Rules.

I do not offer it; I simply submit it for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out clause 3 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"There shall be no provisions in an appropriation bill changing existing law except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures."

Mr. HOLMAN. That, Mr. Speaker, expresses my view as to what this rule ought to be. The evil of this country is excessive appropriations. What has been emphatically condemned by the whole people is excessive appropriations of money, and that has been the case for the last thirteen years.

Mr. OATES. If the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana were adopted, so that you could not introduce any proposition to change existing law, but only to retrench expenditures, how could the gentleman accomplish the reforms that are claimed to be the object and purpose of this power that is proposed to be given to his committee?

Mr. HOLMAN. It certainly expresses clearly the purpose that there shall be no legislation upon an appropriation bill except such as shall retrench expenditures. The trouble with the rule is that the proposition as it now stands limits the power of retrenchment to three things—the abolition of offices, the reduction of salaries, and the reduction of the aggregate of the bill.

Mr. OATES. Then it would allow changes of existing law, would it not, as it now stands?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes; changes of law to retrench expenditures.

Mr. OATES. And changes existing law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, certainly. The reduction of a salary is a change of an existing law.

Mr. OATES. If you will permit me, that brings us exactly to the point upon which I wish to hear you. Why insist upon this change in the rules as reported by the committee? Why do you prefer the proposition which you sent up there, which would prohibit you from changing existing law?

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, because it enlarges the power to legislate in the interest of economy. That was the original rule. That is the rule under which the House was able to carry, against the prolonged opposition of the Senate, propositions reducing the expenditures more than $63,000,000 in the Forty-fourth Congress. I am not insisting on it, because the Committee on Rules are not willing to accept it. The fight which is being made by the gentleman from Louisiana is in the interest of bounties which you have condemned. The Committee on Rules were informed that the rule as reported by that committee was not broad enough to reach all these purposes. I regret that they are not broad enough.

Mr. OATES. I dislike to break in on the discourse of the gentleman, but I wish to understand——

Mr. HOLMAN. I have but a moment, and I promised not to occupy any more time.

Mr. OATES. How could the gentleman retrench expenditures without a change of existing law?

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, you do change existing law, but you do it only where it reduces expenditures.

Mr. OATES. You mean this: That where a law fixes the salary at $5,000 you could appropriate half the money——

Mr. HOLMAN. No; I mean you could reduce the salary.

Mr. OATES. You could appropriate half the money, but that would be a change of existing law.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would reduce the salary. Why, my friend will understand, and I hope this House will understand—especially gentlemen who have not had prior experience in the House—that there were at least two hundred and seventy-four salaries for which reduced appropriations were made in the Forty-fourth Congress, where the salaries have never been changed up to this time by law. We could not get the Senate to change them, but the provisions of the appropriation bill had that effect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OATES. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. WIKE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move the previous question on the clause and pending amendment.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will be allowed to conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] demands the previous question.

Mr. WIKE. I appeal to the gentleman from Mississippi, before he does that, to give me an opportunity to make a statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] demands the previous question upon the pending amendment and the items in the clause.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know whether the effect of that would be to cut off all other amendments?

Mr. McMILLIN. Amendments to this clause only.

Mr. CATCHINGS. That is what I thought.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I make this inquiry because there are some of us who would be glad to see certain amendments adopted. There has been no amendment offered at all to this rule except to strike out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is all that is now pending.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Now, if the House does not see fit to strike it out, there are some of us who would be very glad to see this rule amended in certain particulars.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not think, if the demand for the previous question is sustained, that any other amendments to this clause would be in order.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move the previous question on the clause and pending amendments. Let us have a vote on that.

Mr. DINGLEY. That would cut off all other amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands. The question is on the demand made by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. A parliamentary inquiry. Is it in order to move an amendment to that, so that the previous question shall only cover the pending amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not. You can not amend a demand for the previous question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask if the gentleman from Mississippi asks that the previous question be ordered on the clause of the rule and the amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the question.

Mr. BOUTELLE. The gentleman from Mississippi, I understand, asks the previous question on the proposed rule and all amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I would like to ask whether that includes all amendments that would be in the nature of retrenchment of expenditures?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Oh, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman understands what is meant.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. A question of order——

Mr. BOATNER. Is the previous question called on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana has not offered any amendment.

Mr. BOATNER. I understand he offered an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question upon the pending amendment, offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. I stated what I desired, but I do not wish further to antagonize the committee.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. We have no rules, and the question of order I rose to was the right to demand the previous question upon this clause and all amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the gentleman has that right.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I understand that in the absence of rules the previous question only operates upon the matter which is before the House. I submit to every parliamentarian that the previous question can only operate so as to bring the House to a vote upon the question that is pending when it is ordered, and as the pending question is not the clause, but the amendment to the clause, I submit that if the previous question is ordered it shall operate only upon that particular amendment.

Mr. CATCHINGS. The contrary was ruled by the Speaker of this House on yesterday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was going to state that not only the Speaker had so ruled and established that as a precedent by his ruling, but the Speaker pro tempore, I am informed, has also made the same ruling in the absence of the Speaker, the purpose being to conform the rulings, as they stated, as nearly as may be to the rules of the Fiftieth Congress. Therefore, the present occupant of the chair would take the same course, and has held that the gentleman from Mississippi, in moving the previous question, may do so upon the pending amendment as well as upon the clause.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Was a point of order made before that ruling of the present Speaker was made? If the question was raised I did not hear it. I do not think it was submitted to the House, and if it was I have no knowledge of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is a question of fact which the present occupant of the chair does not state of his own knowledge.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I have no recollection of a question of order being submitted or being ruled upon by the Speaker. The motion having been made, the Speaker put it, and, nobody opposing, it passed; hence no such ruling has been made where the attention of Speaker was called to it. I do not remember of such a point having been made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has been so informed, but it may be an error.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I think there must be an error. I have seen nothing of the kind in the RECORD. I read the RECORD every day, and have seen nothing of the kind, and that certainly has not occurred in my presence.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, aside from all that, it has always been the custom of the House, so far as it could, before the adoption of the rules, to follow the rules of the preceding Congress in the transaction of its business. That is a rule which has prevailed always, as I understand it, under all the rules and of all Congresses.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so stated in his ruling. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to have the amendment read.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, if the previous question should be sustained, would further amendment be in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not to this clause.

The question was then taken on ordering the previous question; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BURROWS. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 119, noes 40.

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER].

Mr. KILGORE. Let that amendment be reported.

The amendment was reported.

The question was taken on the amendment; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BOATNER. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 55, noes 119.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of clause 3.

The question was taken; and the clause was adopted.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by inserting a new clause after that which has just been acted upon.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by inserting, after clause 3, Rule XXI, as follows:

"4. No bill or resolution shall at any time be amended by annexing thereto, or incorporating therewith, the substance of any other bill or resolution pending before the House."

Mr. BLOUNT. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that subject has been passed.

Mr. DINGLEY. This is a new clause.

Mr. BLOUNT. It is substantially a modification of the rule which the House has just agreed to.

Mr. DINGLEY. No; it is a new rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What rule does the gentleman from Georgia refer to?

Mr. BLOUNT. The rule adopted as to what may be done on appropriation bills.

Mr. DINGLEY. This is not only another rule, but it is precisely the rule that existed in the Forty-eighth Congress in connection with the other rule which has just been adopted.

Mr. BLOUNT. I am not denying that at all; but, as I heard it read, it struck me as a modification of the rule just agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will again report the amendment. The Chair does not think it is obnoxious to the criticism which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] makes.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I find it is not what I thought it was.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order, and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] is recognized.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, this provision which I have offered as an amendment is precisely the rule as it existed in the Forty-eighth Congress, when the rule which has already been adopted by the House accompanied it; and therefore, if the object is to restore the old "rider" provisions, the whole rule would be restored with precisely the limitations that existed in the Forty-eighth Congress and in prior Congresses when this practice of putting riders on appropriation bills was permitted.

Mr. BLAND. I believe, however, that in the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses this was abolished.

Mr. DINGLEY. In the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses the whole rule allowing riders on appropriation bills was abolished.

Mr. BLAND. But this particular part especially was abolished.

Mr. DINGLEY. All the rules allowing riders on appropriation bills were abrogated.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that in the interest of good legislation this provision ought to be adopted. I understood the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] yesterday to say that he had no objection to the restoration of this clause as it existed, in connection with the other, in the Forty-eighth Congress, and it seems to me that if the House is to have such a rule as that which has just been adopted this should go with it, so as to carry precisely the limitation that existed in the Congresses when the rule allowing riders upon appropriation bills was in force.

Unless this limitation shall be placed in the rules precisely as it existed in the Forty-eighth Congress, any measure pending before this House may be proposed, on motion of the committee reporting it, as an amendment to an appropriation bill to which it is germane, and it seems to me that it can not possibly be the intention of this House to go to that extent in allowing riders upon appropriation bills.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have in my hand the rules of the Fifty-first Congress, framed in part by the gentleman who now addresses the House [Mr. DINGLEY], and I would like to ask him why it is that that provision was not incorporated into those rules.

Mr. DINGLEY. Because it was unnecessary, for the reason that the prior rule provided that no new legislation should be permitted upon an appropriation bill. That rule having been adopted, it included not only bills that might be pending before the House but any bill that might be proposed. It covered this and more too.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Yet my friend will bear me testimony that the appropriation bills in the last Congress were filled with legislation, some of which I recounted here the other day.

Mr. DINGLEY. If any amendment proposing new legislation was made upon an appropriation bill in this House it must have been done by unanimous consent, because a single objection would have thrown it out.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to discuss this question, but simply to call the attention of gentlemen on the other side to the fact that in proposing to exclude this limitation they go a step further than has ever been attempted in any previous Congress, and they expressly exclude this limitation, which existed in the Forty-eighth Congress. I supposed that when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] said yesterday that he had no objection to restoring the rule as it existed in the Forty-eighth Congress he was sincere, and I have no doubt that we shall find that he occupies that position now. I have no desire to do any more than to submit the question to the judgment of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday when this subject was being discussed and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] was speaking, he mentioned the alteration made in this third clause of Rule XXI, and I remarked, in substance, that that was a matter of no importance and that I saw no objection to restoring it. I made that remark because, according to my understanding, it did not originate in the Forty-eighth Congress, but was a rule which had prevailed for many years before.

It is an old rule, a rule of former years, simply interjected into this third clause; that is my recollection. But, on reflection, members will see that it can be made very mischievous, and may, indeed, be used to perpetrate frauds on the House. For instance, in the last Congress the salary of the minister to Turkey was largely increased. Now, all that any member would have to do to prevent the reduction of that salary would be simply to send to any committee of the House—some committee that would have no opportunity to report—a little bill, saying that the salary of the Turkish minister should be restored to what it was in former years, $10,000. And so all along the line.

Practically this provision has never been of any embarrassment so far as I remember, to the Committee on Appropriations; but Mr. CARLISLE, when Speaker of the House, stated to me, not in open House, but in conversation, the reason why in the Forty-ninth Congress that rule was omitted, for it had existed previously. It was constantly found in practice that when a good amendment was offered to some bill—not necessarily an appropriation bill, but any bill—the point was made that the same proposition was pending before some committee of the House, and in this way a single objection was sufficient to defeat the consideration of the proposed amendment. There never was any value in such a rule and never any reason for it. It ought never to have existed. It never worked any good result in the House so far as my experience has gone. Therefore I hope my friend from Maine will not press this amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. But does not the gentleman understand that this was the rule in the Forty-eighth Congress; and did he not say yesterday that he had no objection to the restoration of this if his provision should be adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have repeated already what I said yesterday.

Mr. BLAND. I wish to ask either of these gentlemen whether this rule obtained in the Forty-fourth Congress? Such is not my recollection.

Mr. HOLMAN. My recollection is that it is an old rule. What was the original object of it I have never been able to ascertain. Its only effect possible in the House was to secure to a gentleman who introduced a proposition and had it referred to a committee with which he was connected the exclusive glory of its passage.

Mr. BLAND. I want to correct the gentleman. I think he will find that this rule was never incorporated in any body of rules in this House until the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. I may be mistaken.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman is mistaken. The rule was never in force here before that Congress. It was found to work the utter destruction of the right of amendment on bills which we were considering; and we abandoned it in the Forty-ninth Congress as absolutely ridiculous.

Mr. DINGLEY. We abandoned the whole principle of riders on appropriation bills in the Forty-ninth Congress; and, therefore, this went with it, being a limitation on that right.

Mr. BLAND. We repealed this for other reasons and at another time.

Mr. PEEL. It occurs to me that this amendment would operate injuriously in regard to the presentation of amendments; for in order to prevent the consideration of any amendment offered to an appropriation bill, it would only be necessary for a member to make the point that the same proposition was embraced in another bill already pending.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. DINGLEY, it was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

4. All bills for improvement of rivers and harbors, for the establishment or change of post routes, and all bills of a private nature, shall be delivered to the Clerk, as in the case of memorials and petitions, for reference to appropriate committees.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I suppose it is not worth while for me to offer an amendment to this provision, because the amendment I propose conforms to the rules of the Fifty-first Congress, and for that reason I suppose it will be promptly rejected. But I desire to call attention to that provision which relates to reference of bills for the "establishment or change of post routes." These words ought to go out, because in the Forty-eighth Congress this whole power with reference to the establishment and change of post routes was conferred upon the Postmaster-General, and since that time there has not been a bill introduced here for the establishment of post routes. But I do not offer any amendment——

Mr. MCMILLIN. There is no objection to the clause going out.

Mr. BURROWS. I think the clause ought to remain, because if we should strike it out then the paragraph would conform to the rules of the Fifty-first Congress. Therefore, we had better adhere to the language as it stands, even if it is ridiculous. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No amendment being offered, the Clerk will proceed with the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. Any petition or memorial or private bill excluded under this rule shall be returned to the member from whom it was received; and petitions and private bills which have been inappropriately referred may, by direction of the committee having possession of the same, be properly referred in the manner originally presented; and an erroneous reference of a petition or private bill under this clause shall not confer jurisdiction upon the committee to consider or report the same.

Mr. ENLOE. I move to amend by inserting as an additional clause what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. All other bills, memorials, and resolutions may, in like manner, be delivered, indorsed with the names of members introducing them, to the Speaker, to be by him referred, and the titles and references thereof and of all bills, resolutions, and documents referred under the rules shall be entered on the Journal and printed in the RECORD of the next day, and correction in case of error of reference may be made by the House in accordance with Rule XI on any day immediately after the reading of the Journal by unanimous consent, or on motion of a committee claiming jurisdiction, or on the report of the committee to which the bill has been erroneously referred.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, my object in offering the amendment just read is to facilitate the business of the House and to prevent not only the unnecessary consumption of time in the call of States for the introduction and reference of bills, but also to afford convenience to the members of the House themselves.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. ENLOE. Certainly.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Is the amendment you have just had read at the desk the third clause of Rule XXII of the Fifty-first Congress?

Mr. ENLOE. It is.

That amendment, Mr. Speaker, as I have stated, will greatly facilitate the transaction of business in the House, and also afford convenience to members. I suppose all of the members who have been here long enough to have acquired experience in their efforts to get an opportunity to offer public bills on the floor of the House, will appreciate the convenience of being permitted to hand them to the Clerk and let them be disposed of just as we dispose of private bills under the rules already adopted. The only question involved, as I understand it, is whether the reference shall be made by the Speaker in open House at the time of their introduction, or whether, as proposed by this amendment, such reference shall be made under the rule of the House. Of course if the Speaker shall make a wrong reference of a bill, it is subject to correction, and there can not possibly be any injustice done to any measure or to any member under the operation of the rule, because, as I have just said, the House always has it in its power to correct an erroneous reference.

I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, in regard to the amendment which has just been offered, speaking for myself alone and not for the Committee on Rules, I think the proposition is a good one. I never have been able to see any sort of necessity for requiring the introduction of bills in a public manner on the call of States and Territories. I think if the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee is adopted it would serve the convenience of members to a great degree.

It is due to gentlemen here that I should make that statement.

Mr. BLAND. If adopted, this amendment would require a change in a rule which we have already passed, I think.

Mr. CATCHINGS. No, sir; only one clause will have to be modified when we reach it hereafter if this is adopted.

Mr. BLAND. I understand we have already, by the rules just adopted, set apart Monday for the introduction of bills.

Mr. CATCHINGS. No; we have not reached that provision yet.

Mr. BLAND. I do not desire to detain the House by discussing the matter, but simply wish to say that, in my judgment, we ought to introduce bills in a public way.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. ENLOE, it was adopted.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment I send to the desk as a fourth clause of the same rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 4, Rule XXII. All resolutions of inquiry addressed to the heads of Executive Departments shall be reported to the House within one week after presentation.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, my reason for offering the amendment is this: An amendment has been offered already and accepted by the House which renders it necessary to strike out clause 1 of Rule XXIV when we reach that rule. That clause contains the provision which I have just offered, and as we have not yet reached Rule XXIV this would seem to be the proper time to introduce the amendment as a supplemental clause to that just adopted and make the rule conform to the action of the House.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio be again reported.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I will state that this is a provision already in the code of rules reported by the committee. It is in clause 1, Rule XXIV.

Mr. CATCHINGS. If my friend will allow me, I will state that I have carefully drawn amendments which will be offered as we progress, intending to frame the rules so as to conform to the changes which are made, and I think if he will withdraw the amendment now we can get along more systematically by adopting the other plan.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. But in view of the fact that we have just adopted the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee, and as this provision has direct reference to that part of the rule which has been amended, this would seem to be a very good place for it.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I have no special objection to its going in there if the gentleman prefers it.

The question being taken, the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

In Committees of the Whole House, business on their Calendars shall be taken up in regular order, except bills for raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors, which shall have precedence; and when objection is made to passing over any bill or proposition, the committee shall thereupon rise and report such objection to the House, which shall decide, without debate, whether such bill or proposition shall be considered or laid aside for the present; whereupon the committee shall resume its sitting without further order of the House.

Mr. ENLOE. I offer an amendment, Mr. Speaker, as a substitute for that clause.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In Committees of the Whole business on their Calendars may be taken up in regular order or in such order as the committee may determine, unless the bill to be considered was determined by the House at the time of going into committee; but bills for raising revenue, general appropriation bills, and bills for the improvement of rivers and harbors shall have precedence.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, if the House will observe, this clause 4 of Rule XXIII provides that when we are in Committee of the Whole, and there is a question raised whether a proposition shall be considered or laid aside for the present, or the question of passing over a bill is raised in the committee, that the committee must rise and go back into the House for the purpose of determining whether or not it will consider that bill. I think that is a sort of circumlocution attachment that we do not need. We find plenty of ways here for not doing things, and for consuming time, without providing especially for it in the rules. Now I can see no reason why the Committee of the Whole, which, as members know, is composed of the whole House, should not dispose of the question without rising and going back into the House, and taking a vote in the House, and then resuming its sitting. Let it be determined in the committee without the necessity of going through this operation. It would be a great saving of time, and it would be a great convenience to the House.

Another thing. I think when we get into the committee, which is composed of the whole House, the committee ought to have the opportunity of determining what measures it will take up, if the House has not already determined that before we go into the Committee of the Whole. That leaves the House free to act in the Committee of the Whole, and gets rid of this unnecessary incumbrance. You will find that if the rule stands as proposed, when we get into Committee of the Whole, some gentleman who does not want to consider a matter which may be reached regularly upon the Calendar may propose to consider something else, and force the committee to rise and go back into the House in order to take a vote upon the question as to whether or not the matter which is regularly reached shall be considered or whether his proposition shall be considered. I want to give the committee the power of determining that, without having to go back into the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] is to strike out clause 4 and to insert that which has been read?

Mr ENLOE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, there is some objection to this amendment, and to state it briefly it is simply this: That in Committee of the Whole there can be no record of a vote, and therefore if it is an important question, or if there is an important bill that you desire to reach and you strike an unimportant bill, there is no way by which you can get a vote by yeas and nays except by going back into the House.

It is true, as the gentleman has stated, that it is sometimes a waste of time, but it is very important, I think, at times that a vote of the House should be taken upon the question as to what measure the committee will take up. Therefore this rule is objectionable.

Mr. ENLOE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly.

Mr. ENLOE. If it is important to put the House upon record as to what the committee shall consider, why can not that be done before we go into Committee of the Whole, upon a motion to take up a particular bill and consider it in Committee of the Whole, and make the record first in that way, and so save the unnecessary consumption of time?

Mr. BYNUM. You can do that; but after you have considered that bill, the committee may desire to go ahead and consider other bills, and therefore you would not have the benefit of a vote except upon one bill, and it would be necessary to go back into the House. Now, it requires no great time for the committee to rise and a vote to be taken in the House, and I think the preservation of this rule is in the direction of the proper conduct of business in the House, and also because it holds members to a strict accountability to their constituents.

Mr. BLAND. I agree with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM]. I think it sometimes happens that an important bill will be fought over in committee, and in that case we ought to have a recorded vote. I hope the rule will remain as reported by the Committee on Rules.

Mr. ENLOE. I want to say to gentlemen who have measures that are going upon this Private Calendar that it is going to be a very large one, and it is going to be very difficult to dispose of any business that is upon that Calendar, and when you get into the Committee of the Whole, when a motion is made to go into the House, which may be repeated two or three times during the day, to determine whether you will consider some other bill, you will consume every Friday, and you will not reach your bills on that Calendar.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let us have a vote.

The amendment offered by Mr. ENLOE was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

6. The House may, by the vote of a majority of the members present, at any time after the five minutes' debate has begun upon proposed amendments to any section or paragraph to a bill, close all debate upon such section or paragraph, or, at its election, upon the pending amendments only (which motion shall be decided without debate); but this shall not preclude further amendment, to be decided without debate.

Mr. BYNUM. I move to strike out the word "House," in the first line, and insert the word "committee." While I think the House should regulate general debate, yet from my experience here it does seem a waste of time that when we are considering bills in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule there can be no limit of debate in committee. Therefore I think it would be a great saving of time if, after you have reached the consideration of a bill by sections and are proceeding under the five-minute rule, the committee should be given power to control or to limit debate. It would certainly save a great deal of time. I do not believe the Committee on Rules will seriously object to that amendment.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let us have a vote.

Mr. CHIPMAN. What is that amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Indiana is to strike out the word "House," in the first line of clause 6, and insert the word "committee," so that the committee may, by the vote of a majority of the members present, at any time after the five-minute debate has begun, close debate upon a section or paragraph.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XXIV.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

1. Each Monday morning during a session of Congress, immediately after the Journal of the proceedings of the last day's sitting has been read and approved, the Speaker shall call all the States and Territories in alphabetical order for bills and resolutions for printing and reference without debate, on which call joint and concurrent resolutions and memorials of State and Territorial Legislatures may be presented and appropriately referred, and on this call only resolutions of inquiry directed to the heads of the Executive Departments shall be in order for reference to appropriate committees, which resolutions shall be reported to the House within one week thereafter.

Mr. REED. I desire to inquire if in the opinion of the Speaker it will be in order to offer a substitute for the entire rule after the reading has been finished, or ought it to be offered now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What rule; XXIII?

Mr. BURROWS. No; Rule XXIV.

Mr. REED. Rule XXIV, the reading of which is now being entered upon. I suppose it would be the most convenient method to offer it and have it pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A substitute for the entire rule? The Chair can not understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. REED. I desire to offer a substitute for Rule XXIV, and my question is at what time it will be in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it can be offered now, and considered as pending; and then, after the text has been perfected, the vote can be taken on the substitute.

Mr. REED. Then it can be offered after the text of the rule has been perfected?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It could be offered just as well after the text has been perfected as now.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I rise simply for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] to the fact that this clause is no longer necessary by reason of the adoption of the two amendments, one introduced by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] and the other by myself.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment to propose for that purpose, which I will send up to the Clerk's desk. I move to amend by striking out clause 1.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule XXIV by striking out clause 1.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. After the Journal is read and approved each day, other than Monday, the Speaker shall lay before the House, for reference, messages from the President, reports and communications from the heads of Departments, and other communications addressed to the House, and also such bills, resolutions, and other messages from the Senate as may have been received on previous days.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out of clause 2 the words "other than Monday."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLIN rose.

Mr. DINGLEY. Has the gentleman an amendment to offer?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Yes, sir. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to offer a substitute. I believe that the provision has been stricken out authorizing the call of the States and Territories for the introduction of bills on Monday.

Mr. CATCHINGS. We have not reached that.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I offer the substitute which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. After the Journal is read and approved each day, the Speaker shall lay before the House for reference messages from the President, reports and communications from the heads of Departments, and other communications addressed to the House, also such bills and resolutions and other measures from the Senate as may have been received on previous days, and no such measure, report, communication, or resolution shall be printed except by order of the Speaker of the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, my reason for offering an amendment, such as is contained in the latter part of the clause, is, that it has been the experience of every man who has occupied the chair that a very large number of accompanying documents which need not be printed are printed under the rules of the House where there is an express direction given that they must be printed. The Public Printer has complained frequently of the amount of work that is thus cast upon the Printing Office that might be avoided, and I think we should leave it to the Speaker to determine what should be printed, instead of requiring everything to be printed. It will not deprive the House of the opportunity to print, but will reserve to the Speaker of the House to say whether it shall be printed or not. It reserves the question of printing until it is either ordered by the Speaker or recommended by the committee to which the message or measure is referred. I think that therefore it should be adopted.

Mr. BYNUM. What printing does the gentleman speak of?

Mr. MCMILLIN. The documents that accompany executive and other communications and communications from the heads of Departments. Some of them which come into the Speaker's room will have a message of not more than one page, and yet the accompanying documents would make a book that would take the whole force of the Printing Office a day to set it up.

Mr. BYNUM. That is all it applies to.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The object is to have the rules provide that they shall not be printed until the Speaker or the committee to which the document has been referred shall order it.

Mr. BYNUM. That is all it applies to.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAYES] has suggested that it would be well to leave it in the power of the House to direct the printing. I am entirely willing that it should be construed so as to mean that it was left in the power of the House. It is not the purpose in offering the amendment to cut the House or the Speaker off from the right of having the printing done at the time that the references are made by the House if it so desires.

Mr. REED. It would be very much better to leave it to the Speaker, as it would be very difficult for the House to decide.

Mr. HAYES. I only wanted to suggest that we should not cut off the right of the House, if it desires to order it; while this seems to leave it entirely with the Speaker.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is not the object of the rule. The rules heretofore have required this printing to be done; and it has been the experience of every man who has occupied that chair that a great many of these accompanying documents need not be printed. I know it was mine. Even in the brief period I was there I came to the conclusion that there ought to be some reform in this matter; and I have no doubt that the ex-Speaker will bear me testimony that there are frequently documents brought in that need not be printed, the cost of which is great. They are all ultimately bound and sent to members.

Mr. DICKERSON. Would it not be better to have such documents printed only when the committee in charge of the subject makes a report recommending the printing?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I think the object is accomplished when you leave the subject to the Speaker, because if he is in doubt he will let the matter go to the committee. The gentleman from Kentucky will remember that we had an instance of that kind here this session, when the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, upon examination of certain papers, thought that they, or a portion of them, ought to be printed, and we passed a resolution to that effect.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer as an amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Tennessee what I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of the substitute as follows: "And House bills with Senate amendments which do not require consideration in Committee of the Whole may be at once disposed of as the House may determine."

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, on that amendment I make the point that it has already been voted down.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not this. The proposition that was voted down admitted the immediate consideration of bills that involved the expenditure of money, but this does not; this simply covers bills that do not involve expenditure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] to make the point of order against this amendment?

Mr. McMILLIN. I make the point of order because my recollection is that this is the substance of an amendment heretofore voted down.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, it is different in one important particular. This does not apply to bills involving appropriations. But, Mr. Speaker, is not this the peril of adopting this amendment? You pass an important bill here; it goes to the Senate; and the Senate, without placing upon it any appropriation of money, substitute some other measure which they desire to have passed and send that back to the House. Now, why should that Senate measure have priority here? The effect would be to place our rules at the mercy of the action of the Senate.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have allowed my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to take up my time thus far——

Mr. HOLMAN. I thought the gentleman had yielded the floor.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve, until after I examine the question, the further point of order that this is not germane.

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, certainly it is. This is the only place that it could properly come in.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to this matter in order that they may understand the exact situation. If the rules, as proposed, shall be adopted without the amendment offered by myself, then a House bill which has been fully considered here and sent to the Senate, and which is returned from the Senate with an amendment, however slight, an amendment not involving any expenditure of money, that House bill, which has already received full consideration here, must go to the committee to which the subject belongs, and when the committee report on the Senate amendment their report will go to the foot of the Calendar and can not possibly be reached for consideration under the rules.

Now, if the majority desire deliberately to put themselves in that position, of course they may do so, but they should do it thoroughly understanding the situation. My amendment proposes that when a bill comes back here from the Senate with a slight amendment, not involving an appropriation, the amendment may be immediately considered in the House, as was done in the Fifty-first Congress. I think there should be no objection to such an amendment as that.

Mr. BYNUM. Why not go farther and include also House bills, as the rules of the last Congress did?

Mr. DINGLEY. For myself I should be entirely willing to do that. I suppose, however, that in such a case as my amendment contemplates, the bill having been considered by the House and the Senate and returned here with a slight amendment not involving an appropriation, it ought to be considered privileged, as it would be in every parliamentary body outside of this.

Mr. BYNUM. I do not see any objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Maine, and I should be willing to go farther.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the rules adopted so far—and I suppose that this code in full will be adopted, and that there will be no change in what has been adopted already—put the House in this attitude toward the Senate, an attitude which it has always occupied and which it will probably continue to occupy. Not being allowed here to put "riders" upon appropriation bills (which are our main bills), and the Senate having no rule prohibiting that practice, riders are put upon the appropriation bills in the Senate, and when those bills come back to the House our rules, of course, do not apply to the Senate amendments. So the House disagrees to the amendments and a conference is ordered, and the matter comes in here in the form of a conference report. So that the power of the House to legislate in such cases is the power which the Senate gives us. Now, as the bills that are not appropriation bills, unless we adopt some plan by which, when they come back from the Senate, we can take them up and pass them, we shall substantially put the House in the attitude of saying that no legislation shall go through this House this session.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is what the rules provide for practically.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. We may as well look at the matter frankly. Even if we had no rules we could not legislate in this House with much freedom on account of the multiplicity of our measures, the crowded state of the Calendars and the necessary priority that must be given to appropriation bills. For these reasons, I say, even if we had no rules it would be very troublesome to pass much important legislation here. Now, one outlet that we have is that the Senate can put "riders" upon appropriation bills which come back here with those "riders" and which, when we fail to agree to them, go into conference.

The other outlet is that when the Senate passes a bill and sends it over here the Speaker may lay it before the House and the House may have an opportunity to act upon it. If we send the bill to a committee, the bill, when reported back, goes to the Calendar, and nobody ever heard of anything coming off the Calendar unless by unanimous consent except an appropriation bill. Now, I do not mean to say——

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understood my friend to say that while we have restricted ourselves as to the liberty of amendment on appropriation bills the Senate allows such liberty.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is simply a matter of practice. The Senate has had the same rule that we have had.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Oh, I do not say that the Senate may not have some rule on the subject; I am speaking of the actual course of proceeding.

Mr. HOLMAN. They have had the same rule that we have had.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. But in the Senate the rule is not adhered to. Everybody knows—I can call to mind twenty instances—that frequently we strike a provision out of an appropriation bill on a point of order——

Mr. HOLMAN. That can be done in the Senate.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. The provision is struck out in this House on a point of order, but the gentleman interested does not make any disturbance about it here; he simply goes to his Senator or some other Senator who is interested, and says "put that on in the Senate." The Senator appealed to, being generally in the Western tense of the word a "clever fellow," and the Senate being very much given to what is known as "the courtesy of the Senate," the provision is put on there.

With that provision inserted, the bill comes back here; and then it is not obnoxious to any rule of the House. The House possibly nonconcurs in the amendment; a conference committee is appointed; and if the gentleman in favor of this provision happens to be (as was the case in one notable instance which I recall) a member of the conference committee, he brings in a report in favor of concurring in the amendment of the Senate; and so the provision passes.

Refer to the history of our legislation, and you will find that as to the larger part of it, provisions which, under the operation of our rules, are struck out in House bills, are put on by the Senate, and when the bills are returned are agreed to upon a conference report, and so become law.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I will ask only a couple of minutes to complete my statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the gentleman's time will be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. That being the practice, for I am now discussing the question only in its practical aspect, there is an outlet for legislation on appropriation bills. Now, how shall we cut out legislation on bills which are not appropriation bills? There are practically but two methods or possibly three. One is under a suspension of the rules. On two Mondays in each month, under a suspension of the rules, we pass by a two-thirds vote measures which are either political or which on account of their nature are generally acceptable to the House. In this way a great many bills go through.

Secondly, many measures pass by unanimous consent, either through the Speaker's recognition of a member to call up a particular measure or by the action of the House at the pension session on Friday night, when the proceedings are practically by unanimous consent, as there is no quorum present. The other method is for the Senate to send us a bill, which is often—I will not say most often—substantially a House bill, which has been favorably reported by a House committee and is on the Calendar, where it can not be reached in our administration of business. Now, in regard to bills thus coming from the Senate, why might not such bills be submitted by the Speaker for the action of the House before their reference? This involves no arbitrary power of any sort. There is no power on the part of anybody to take any advantage.

The Speaker lays the bill before the House, subject immediately to the right of any gentleman to raise the question of consideration. This is simply a mode of reaching a conclusion; and no one has any undue advantage. The bill is halfway toward becoming a law. It has passed the Senate; it needs only the consideration of the House. If the measure is one which ought to be rejected, let it be rejected. If it is so important as to require consideration by a committee, let the House send it to a committee, and send it, if thought proper, with instructions to report at a given time or to report with certain amendments. If the House, when a bill is thus presented, chooses to pass it, so much is consummated.

I wish to add but one more thought. Any Representative who serves in this House for one term—serves laboriously and faithfully, striving honestly to do his duty, anxious to do that which his constituents require at his hands—finds at the end of his term that he has labored without cessation and that his work is still on his hands. Now, so far as it goes this proposition does furnish a practical mode for accomplishing legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to understand from the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] whether he regards the point of order made by him as pending or whether it is withdrawn?

Mr. MCMILLIN. On an examination of the amendment formerly offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] I find that the one now presented is materially different from it. I also find, contrary to my first impression, that this amendment is germane to the pending proposition. I therefore withdraw the point of order.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, the importance of the proposition now under consideration is more apparent than real. As a matter of fact, if a House bill has passed the Senate and been returned, with what my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] calls an "important amendment," under the practice prevailing in the Fiftieth and preceding Congresses, when the Speaker was about to lay such bill before the House for suitable reference, when unanimous consent was asked it was almost invariably granted that the amendment of the Senate should be considered and the bill put upon its passage. Or if an objection was made to the unanimous consent, then on the request of some member the Speaker would retain the bill on his table, and it is true that such bills were rarely referred, but, as I have said, were usually passed when they were laid before the House, or if objection was made, they were retained on the Speaker's table until some time when they could be passed without objection.

Mr. BLAND. If the gentleman will yield to me for a moment——

Mr. CATCHINGS. Certainly, for a question.

Mr. BLAND. I was going to suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Mississippi must be aware of the fact, as we all are, that when these bills were thus presented at the Speaker's table and unanimous consent asked for their consideration, that consent was rarely granted. Objection was ordinarily made; and the gentleman is entirely mistaken in saying it was almost the universal practice of the House to give unanimous consent. I think the fact is that it was almost universally the other way, and the gentleman making the request for unanimous consent would go over on that side or come to members on this side, and run all over the House trying to get members to withdraw their objection. This was the inconvenience that members were subjected to under that practice.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I thought I had yielded to my friend from Missouri for a question and not for a speech.

But, Mr. Speaker, in vindication of what I did say on this subject, permit me to submit some facts to the House bearing upon the question. It is true, as I have said, that where House bills have been returned from the Senate with immaterial amendments, they did pass the House when laid before it by the Speaker in nine cases out of ten, by unanimous consent. Their reference to committees, except where the amendments were of a very important and material character, was rare. It was only, in fact, where the amendments were material that they were referred to the committee.

Now, I want to say to the House that there were passed by the Fifty-first Congress of public acts and joint resolutions 611, and in the Fiftieth Congress 571, or only a difference of about 40. There is enough in that record of those two Congresses to vindicate the statement I have made. There were passed in the Fifty-first Congress of House bills 1,508, and this includes pension bills, public and private, and all other bills, while in the Fiftieth Congress the number was 1,234. But the difference of 300, or the apparent difference, is accounted for by the fact that there was an increased number of private pension bills passed in the Fifty-first Congress. So I assert it as true that just as many private bills, outside of the pension bills, and as many public bills and general bills passed the Fiftieth Congress as the Fifty-first Congress. I repeat, therefore, I am correct in stating that in some way or other where these Senate amendments to House bills were not material the amendments were considered by the House and the bills became laws.

But one of the principal objections which is made to this provision is that if it be adopted it gives the right of way to such bills coming from the Senate. It may be that the House may desire to take up and consider more important measures pending before it. But if the amendment is adopted it will be in order, whenever a bill of that character is presented at the Speaker's desk, to move to proceed at once to its consideration. And so we would find several hours, and even longer, if the amendments are important, taken up with the consideration of such bills, when the House might be desirous of proceeding with other and more important matters.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I think, therefore, sir, that the rule in question would return to plague us if the Speaker should rule that such bills are privileged. I do not know how he would rule, of course, whether it was a matter of right for the friend of one of these bills to have it considered or not. I do not remember what the ruling of the Speaker was in the last Congress, whether it was held to be a privileged matter or not. I would yield to the gentleman from Maine if he will answer the question.

Mr. REED. It was held to be a privileged matter, of course.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I would assume so.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But this amendment makes it privileged even if there had been no decision, and the House could not go on with any other business or get such a bill out of the way except by raising the question of consideration.

Mr. MCRAE. Oh, not at all.

Mr. REED. That would not be quite accurate. There are other methods of doing that.

Mr. MCRAE. There would be various other ways to dispose of the matter.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not recall one. This would be the first business in order after the reading of the Journal; that is, clearing the Speaker's table. If the resolution is adopted, we do not make a single exception, and when the work of laying these bills before the House is commenced it can not be suspended until it is completed; and if the Senate amendment takes up the whole day, it has to be dedicated to it, no matter what matters may be pressing. This was not contemplated in the rules, and hence they have not been framed with a view to limiting that time.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I think, Mr. Speaker, we will get practically just as many of these bills through under the old system as under that proposed, and I think the House will find itself sometimes in a serious situation if the amendment is adopted.

I will close my remarks by requesting the privilege of publishing a comparative statement which I hold in my hand, which embraces the Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, and Fifty-first Congresses, and which gentlemen may hereafter find of some convenience.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to print the statement which he sends to the Clerk's desk. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I am quite aware that it will perhaps be useless for me to offer any argument in support of the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], inasmuch as the Committee on Rules object to its adoption. If, however, I am able to understand the position which has just been taken by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] it amounts to this: That he relies upon unanimous consent to pass House bills with Senate amendments, instead of the provisions of this amendment, which would give the House the right to consider House bills with such amendments if it so desired. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am frank to say that after a House bill has been fully considered by this body, and then passed by the Senate with an amendment, it seems to me it ought to have the right of consideration by the House, if the House so desires.

The effect of the rejection of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine will be to send House bills with Senate amendments to committees, and upon the reports from such committees the bills will go to the foot of the several Calendars, the result being that although a member may have employed hours, and weeks, perhaps, of work to pass a bill to which a slight amendment has been made by the Senate, he will find his work fruitless at the close of the session. Mr. Speaker, I suppose the amendment will be rejected, but I simply wish to put upon record my approval of the proposition.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended at this time to trouble the House with some general remarks upon this subject, but I think perhaps it may be as well that the debate should take the range that fairly belongs to it in this direction.

There is nothing more striking than the constant recurrence of these objections, which tend to show the state of mind into which the House of Representatives, after years of repression, has succeeded in getting. If there is one principle which is more nearly universal in parliamentary law than any other, it is that when there are two bodies, the assent of both of which is essential to legislation, that it is the duty of each of those bodies to so frame its rules as to make progress in legislation. That legislation which is nearest completed is the legislation which is entitled to the first place, and, to use the language of the gentleman from Tennessee, the place of privilege. That is an universal principle of parliamentary law in legislative assemblies which are composed of two parts, and it rests upon obvious and sound sense.

If this House has passed a bill and has submitted it to the other branch, and that other branch has acted upon it, surely it stands to common sense and reason that the first business of this branch ought to be to consider the amendments which have been made by the other branch for the purpose of carrying out its own ideas, which necessarily may have to be modified by the ideas entertained by the other assembly. Surely a statement of that is all that is necessary to carry conviction. Like all other statements of fact, it carries its own argument with it. But we have got in such a state of mind that men are looking around eternally to see how they can kill something. That is an attitude of mind which we have gotten into, which, it seems to me, is a mistake, and which has reached such a culmination that the hour of correction should now have arrived. I beg to say to gentlemen that their support of the amendment which I propose to offer will be in no sense an indorsement of the Fifty-first Congress, of its wickedness, or the assuming of any of the opprobrium which was thrown upon us.

The proposition which I purpose to submit to you is one which had the sanction of antiquity. It had the sanction of Congress for many years. It was not an innovation by the Fifty-first Congress, but a return to the principles of the fathers; and I must say that I am grieved when I find that gentlemen upon the other side are utterly unwilling to return to the principles of the fathers when they have been adopted by the Fifty-first Congress, but are so tender of them when they have not. But I do not care particularly whether there are precedents for it or not. So long as they are good sense and commend themselves to intelligent men, why should they not be followed? Now, the system in the last Congress, which was the system in Congresses gone by, was very simple. We gave the preference, by taking up first the business on the Speaker's table, to those measures of legislation which had come nearest to enactment, which, in other words, had progressed farthest toward completion. Those we took up and finished. That is the principle upon which unfinished business has the preference.

The time of Mr. REED having expired, on motion of Mr. CATCHINGS it was extended five minutes.

Mr. REED. The next provision, after allowing preference to House bills with Senate amendments or Senate bills which had been substantially favorably reported by committees of the House, the next thing was to have a morning hour in which bills that did not appropriate money might be taken up and finished; not a morning hour such as you have got in these rules. Not a morning hour of one size all the way through, but a morning hour that could be extended, so that no man could choke the progress of legislation. Now, what is that class of legislation? It is for the most part bills to which no human being can have any reasonable objection after examination and debate, although they might be killed under unanimous consent. There is an immense amount of legislation which is purely local, which affects localities, and only needs explanation, because we are not all so familiar with the needs of localities. A bill which would be killed under unanimous consent may, after a few words of explanation, be satisfactory to the House; and there are other bills which ought to pass, which would have the sanction of the great majority of the House, and yet may be killed by a few persons filibustering against them. Hence it was provided in the rules of the Fifty-first Congress that a morning hour which took up only bills which did not appropriate money might be enlarged whenever the House saw fit to refuse to go to other business.

Now, did this give injurious preference to bills of small consequence over large bills? Why, the bills of most importance are revenue and appropriation bills, and these are provided for under these rules by giving them the right of way at all times, or should be. There is another class of important bills that are neither revenue bills nor appropriation bills; and you have provided that the Committee on Rules shall have power at any time, at any moment, to come in here and give them superior privilege over any privilege that is given whatever. Now, with the addition of the amendment which I desire to propose, you will have a system which will not only accomplish the large local work and accomplish it without friction, but will relieve the Speaker tremendously.

You have no idea of the pressure that is put on him by these requests for unanimous consent; and if you bring the whole business of the House through the avenue of unanimous consent, you are sure to have it choked. But you say bills pass in every House. Yes, gentlemen, bills have got to go through—a good many of them. They will get through under one system or another; but the unanimous consent system, except so far as you can not possibly prevent it, is a vicious system, because in practice it throws the killing of a bill upon one man. That precipitates upon him all the friends of the bill, and he can not do anything for his constituents. The result is we are giving bond, not only to keep the peace, but to keep silent. [Laughter.]

Now, gentlemen, what is the use of allowing personal prejudices, old prejudices, to prevent you from doing justice to yourselves and to the business of the House. I ought to say one word more, and that is, that the work of the last Congress was done under stress of fight from the beginning—from the reading of the Journal until the day of adjournment, and if the ship sailed over that stormy sea, how much better you will be in the summer sea that will characterize us.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But we do not want all of our sailors drowned. [Laughter].

Mr. REED. That comes back to my friend's test. His test of virtue is success. That has not been the test of the righteous. [Laughter.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let us have a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] to the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN.]

Mr. MCRAE. What is the amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee, and also the amendment to that amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maine.

The substitute and amendment were read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I hope that amendment will be adopted. No good reason has been assigned why it should not be. No reason at all can be assigned that does not imply distrust in the House itself and a discrimination against our own bills. As has often been said to-day and yesterday in this debate, it is right that House bills with Senate amendments should have the privilege of consideration when laid before the House by the Speaker. If we mean to legislate some such rule as this is necessary and will be adopted, unless members who have bills are willing to say now, in advance, by voting against this just amendment, that they prefer the vicious and humiliating practice which requires them to constantly beseech the Speaker, and appeal to the objectors who may be upon this floor, to the manly, just rule which gives them the right to demand a hearing upon their bills when they have reached such a privileged stage.

I want to remind my associates who were in the Forty-ninth Congress of one who was here then, but who has since passed away, but who, with rules similar to those we are about to enact, refused all unanimous consents, as he said, to show the absurdity of the rules. In that Congress he permitted no bill to pass by unanimous consent when he was present. Now, gentlemen, it may be that there is in this Congress another such man, and if so, almost all of the bills, private and public, important and unimportant, which you and your constituents are interested in will never be considered, and you will go home only to tell your constituents that you by mistake or otherwise assisted in making rules that put it in the power of one man to defeat their will and your will. Is a Democratic House so distrustful of itself as to refuse the privilege of consideration of amendments to measures to which it has given full consideration? If gentlemen who oppose this amendment so believe, let them avow it by their votes, but as for me, I am not willing to vote such distrust of this or any other Democratic House. The only objection I have to the amendment is that it does not go far enough.

The question was taken on Mr. DINGLEY'S amendment and the Speaker pro tempore stated that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I ask for a division.

The House divided; but before the result was announced Mr. CATCHINGS withdrew the demand for a division, and the amendment of Mr. DINGLEY was agreed to.

The substitute as amended was then agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. On all days other than Monday, as soon as the business on the Speaker's table has been disposed of, and on all Mondays (except the first and third in each month) after the call of States and Territories, there shall be a morning hour for reports from committees, which shall be appropriately referred and printed, and a copy thereof mailed by the Public Printer to each Member and Delegate, if requested in writing by the Member or Delegate; and the Speaker shall call upon each standing committee in regular order and then upon the select committees; and if the whole of the hour is not consumed by this call, then it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of other business as hereinafter provided; but if he shall not complete the call within the hour, he shall resume it in the succeeding morning hour where he left off.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment which I send to the desk, in order to make this paragraph conform to an amendment heretofore adopted.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In clause 3, amend by inserting in the first line, between the words "than" and "Monday," the words "the first and third," and by making the word "Monday," in the same line, "Mondays," and by inserting in same line, after the word "Mondays," the words "in each month," and by striking out in the second, third, and fourth lines the words "and on all Mondays (except the first and third in each month) after the call of States and Territories;" so that, as amended, it will read as follows:

"On all days other than the first and third Mondays in each month, as soon as the business on the Speaker's table has been disposed of, there shall be a morning hour for reports, etc."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS].

Mr. HEMPHILL. The operation of this rule, I understand, would be to give a morning hour on the days which have been generally devoted to business reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I think it would. If the gentleman desires to have a change made I have no objection.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I move to strike out the words which provide for a morning hour on those days.

Mr. CATCHINGS. You mean that you wish to provide that on the second and fourth Mondays of each month there shall be no morning hour. As I have proposed to amend the rule, Mr. Speaker, it conforms exactly to the rule in the Fiftieth Congress.

Mr. HEMPHILL. As I remember, the rule setting apart certain days for the business of the District of Columbia provides that the day shall begin immediately after the approval of the Journal.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Yes. The rule provides that the second and fourth Mondays of each month, after the call of the States and Territories, shall be set apart for that business.

Mr. HEMPHILL. And the result will be that there will be a conflict between that and the second and third paragraphs of this rule.

Mr. CATCHINGS. No conflict more than there has always been. We do not alter the rule of the Fiftieth Congress at all.

Mr. REED. In the Fifty-first Congress the point was made clear.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I do not think there is any room for conflict. In the Fiftieth Congress it was always held that the second and fourth Mondays of the month were set apart for the consideration of business from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Without the intervention of the morning hour.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Yes. It was repeatedly so construed by the Speaker. I do not think the gentleman need apprehend the slightest difficulty about that.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to offer an amendment unnecessarily, and as it is the understanding of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] that the morning hour is not to be allowed on the second and fourth Mondays of the month, I will let the rule pass now and will urge his view upon the Speaker at the proper time if it becomes necessary.

Mr. CATCHINGS. It was always so held in the Fiftieth Congress.

The amendment of Mr. CATCHINGS was agreed to.

The paragraph as amended was then agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

4. The morning hour for the call of committees shall not be dispensed with except by a vote of two-thirds of those present and voting thereon.

5. After the morning hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees (or the call completed), the Speaker shall again call the committees in regular order for one hour, upon which call each committee, on being named, shall have the right to call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day, on either the House or Union Calendar. And whenever any committee shall have occupied the said hour for one day, it shall not be in order for such committee to designate any other proposition for consideration until all the other committees shall have been called in their turn; and when any proposition shall have occupied two hours on this call it shall thereafter remain on the Calendar as unfinished business and be taken up in its order: Provided, That when the hour herein prescribed shall expire while the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is considering a bill, the said committee shall rise without motion therefor.

Mr. MCKENNA. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend paragraph 5 by inserting after the word "order," in line 13, the following:

"That debate on any bill called up by a committee as aforesaid shall not exceed one hour and a half, and at the expiration thereof the previous question shall be considered as ordered on all amendments and on the engrossment and third reading and passage of said bill; and no dilatory motion shall be entertained by the Speaker during the pendency of said bill during such morning hour: And provided further, That if voting be commenced on said bill it shall be continued, notwithstanding the expiration of the morning hour, and the result duly announced, declaring the bill passed or defeated, as the case may be."

Mr. MCKENNA. Members will observe that the so-called morning hour allows two hours for the consideration of a bill—one hour on one day and one on the succeeding day. Members should also observe that under another rule a member obtaining the floor in his own right is entitled to occupy it for an hour. Now, the gentleman who calls up a bill for consideration in the morning hour is entitled to occupy the floor for an hour, but usually he does not do so; he occupies simply enough time to explain the measure. Any gentleman in opposition to the bill always occupies his hour, either by his own speech or by distribution of his time to other members. Now, one amendment and a vote on it, one motion of any kind and a vote on it, and the morning hour is gone; the bill called up has passed to what has been called a more musty place than the "tomb of the Capulets;" and the member interested in the legislation finds himself in the situation of Tantalus as described in ancient poetry and mythology, who—

> From circling floods in vain refreshment craves,
> And pines with thirst amidst a sea of waves;
> When to the water he his lip applies,
> Back from the lip the treacherous water flies.

Mr. Speaker, when Homer wrote those lines and when Pope interpreted them they prefigured a member of the House of Representatives trying to pass a bill in the morning hour. [Laughter.] The amendment I have submitted preserves the morning hour and makes it useful.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MCKENNA. I would like to occupy a few moments more in further explanation of the amendment.

Mr. ANDREW. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. MCKENNA. I do not wish to consume unnecessarily the time of the House. I am urging this amendment with the utmost good faith, because I believe it will enable us to do some business.

My amendment provides for closing debate in one hour and a half. That is ordinarily enough time, because no bill can pass in the morning hour which is not at first view correct, or which can not be shown to be so upon a rapid explanation. At the expiration of an hour and a half the previous question is to be considered as ordered upon the bill. Then we proceed to vote, provided no dilatory motion be interposed; and my amendment forbids any such motion. The voting once commenced is concluded and the result announced. What objection, Mr. Speaker, can there be to this proposition? It gives force, vitality, and usefulness to the morning hour, and does not interfere with anything.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. MCKENNA was rejected, there being—ayes 33, noes 85.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles; in which concurrence was requested:

A bill (S. 1215) for an extension of appropriation for the erection of a public building at Los Angeles, Cal.;

A bill (S. 1604) to provide for the creation of a fourth judicial district in the Territory of Utah;

A bill (S. 1610) to increase the endowment of the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College and for the Southern University of Louisiana; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 9) to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the governor of the State of West Virginia the sum appropriated by the act of Congress entitled "An act to credit and pay to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia all moneys collected under the direct tax levied by the act of Congress approved August 6, 1861."

THE RULES.

The Clerk, resuming, read the following:

7. Unfinished business, if any, having been disposed of, motions shall be in order as follows:

First. That the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider, first, bills raising revenue and general appropriation bills, and then other business on its Calendar.

Second. To proceed to the consideration of business on the House Calendar.

Third. On Friday of each week, after the morning hour, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar; and if this motion fail, then public business shall be in order as on other days.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask whether I made a motion to strike out clause 1 of Rule XXI. If I did not, I desire now to recur to that rule in order to perfect it by such an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion was not made; but the gentleman asked unanimous consent to recur to that clause whenever he might so desire.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I ask unanimous consent to strike out clause 1 of Rule XXI, so as to make that rule conform to the provision which has been adopted allowing bills to be introduced by handing them in and having them referred by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to striking out the clause indicated?

There being no objection, Rule XXI was amended accordingly.

Mr. BURROWS. While on that rule, Mr. Speaker, I would ask unanimous consent that the words to which I referred this morning in paragraph 4, namely—be also stricken out, as that matter is fixed by law.

For the establishment or change of post routes—

Mr. CATCHINGS. I consent to that.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I thought they were stricken out this morning.

Mr. BURROWS. I understand not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the words indicated by the gentleman from Michigan will be stricken out.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. CATCHINGS. It is understood that the request I made has been adopted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was done by unanimous consent.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a further amendment, to come in after the third clause of section 7. The amendment I have offered has already been published in the RECORD, on page 525.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend clause 3 of section 7 of Rule XXIV by adding the following proviso: "Provided, That on the first Friday hereafter, when bills on the Private Calendar shall be under consideration, bills reported by the Committee on War Claims shall be passed over and other bills be considered in their order; and on the second Friday thereafter, when bills on the Private Calendar are being considered, bills reported by the Committee on Claims shall be passed over and other bills considered in their order, and, on each Friday thereafter, when bills on the Private Calendar are being considered, said committees shall alternate in the same manner in the consideration of the bills respectively reported by them."

Mr. BYNUM. The only effect of the amendment, Mr. Speaker, is that the Committee on War Claims shall occupy the time of the House in the consideration of its reports on one Friday, to the exclusion of the Committee on Claims, when bills reported by the Committee on War Claims are reached for consideration, and on the next Friday the Committee on Claims shall occupy the time of the House, to the exclusion of the Committee on War Claims, when its bills are reached. It simply alternates, dividing the time equally between the two committees. There are, as is well known, a large number of war claims that have been reported to this House or to Congress from time to time for many years past until they have become chronic.

The Committee on War Claims—I understand, although I do not know whether I am correctly informed or not—have agreed to report all bills favorably that have been reported favorably heretofore. That has been the rule of the Committee on War Claims, I believe, ever since I have been here. There are, therefore, usually a number of contested war claims that get at the head of the Private Calendar, and, as in the last Congress and in previous Congresses, the whole time of the House will be taken up thereby by the Committee on War Claims, and no other business on the Calendar will ever be transacted.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly.

Mr. DOCKERY. Did I understand you correctly to state that the Committee on War Claims had agreed that without examination they would report claims favorably to the House that had been favorably reported in prior Congresses?

Mr. BYNUM. That is what I understand.

Mr. ENLOE. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me to correct him?

Mr. BYNUM. I will stand corrected if the gentleman has any other information.

Mr. ENLOE. I have some other information.

Mr. BYNUM. Very well.

Mr. ENLOE. I happen to be a member of the Committee on War Claims myself; and I will state to the gentleman that the rule adopted by the committee was this: That the chairman of the committee should refer the bills to the members of that committee, and that a member of the committee, upon an investigation of a case, if he found that it had been previously reported favorably to the House, and the report commended itself to him as correct, would be authorized to report it favorably.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the practical operation of the rule to which the gentleman from Indiana refers has been to place at the head of the Calendar a large number of these private bills reported by the Committee on War Claims, obstructing the consideration of all others.

Mr. ENLOE. The question as to which report shall be placed at the head of the Private Calendar depends on which report gets there first. And it has not operated that way in other Congresses in favor of the Committee on War Claims more than in favor of the Committee on Claims. So there is nothing in that point.

But I desired only to correct a misapprehension when I arose.

Mr. BYNUM. I stand corrected as to the condition of the case. I was not certain that I had been correctly advised; but the result has been that a number of contested claims, if not right at the beginning of the session, usually within a very short time reach the head of the Calendar and completely block all legislation or all efforts to reach claims which would require no time, so far as the House was concerned. But these reports from the Committee on Claims will be cut off from all chance of consideration, their pathway being blocked by the reports from the Committee on War Claims.

Now, I think it perfectly fair that each of these committees should have one-half of the time. It does not interfere with any other bill on the Calendar because the Calendar is taken up on the first Friday and called in its order. A bill is reached, reported by the War Claims Committee, and it is passed over. When a bill is reached, reported by the Committee on Claims, it is taken up for consideration. There can be, therefore, no objection to it. It does not interfere with other bills that come up in regular order in their turn from any other committee. It simply places it in the power of the House to reach their cases on the Calendar without having its way blocked. It is a fair division of the time. It alternates the Fridays between the committees.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, it might be urged that bills first reported to the House are first entitled to consideration, and ought to be considered; but from the fact that the bills from the Committee on War Claims are bitterly contested as a rule, questions of loyalty entering into them, and their consideration necessarily occupying much time, I think they ought to be willing to yield at least a part of the time to the other committees for the consideration of their bills.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I do not think I am exactly pleased with the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM]. I can not see why there is any necessity for making any discrimination as to this Private Calendar and adopting a different rule to govern it than that which governs the disposition of business on the other Calendars. I think the gentleman might with equal propriety propose to divide among the committees of this House the disposition of the business that is on the Union Calendar or the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. BYNUM. This is on the House Calendar.

Mr. ENLOE. It is on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BYNUM. The Private Calendar is a House Calendar.

Mr. ENLOE. And I will say further that if the Committee on War Claims brings in its business and places it on the Calendar, that it is as much entitled to consideration as the business from any other committee of the House, whenever it is reached. It should be disposed of in one way or the other. I do not want to place it in such a position that any gentleman who happens to have some claim of a different character can avail himself of the opportunity to filibuster out the Friday that is devoted to war claims, and then take another Friday to consider claims that are not any more meritorious that do not happen to be war claims. I want to give the business from this committee an equal opportunity to be considered under the rules with the business from other committees of the House.

Mr. MANSUR. Mr. Speaker, it is familiar to every member of this House who was here last year, that for three months the War Claims Committee monopolized the time on private bill day, and blocked the way for everything else in the shape of private bills. In the Forty-ninth Congress there were 1,700 bills referred to the Claims Committee, 2,000 in the Fiftieth, and 2,500 in the Fifty-first. This accumulation of bills is very largely due to the fact that in both the Fiftieth and Fifty-first Congresses bills of a private and domestic character, of which every member of this House has probably one or more of a similar character, never received any consideration, because they could not get a hearing. If, then, the members of this House are disposed to pass private bills, arising out of its ordinary everyday business, it is very evident that with the number of war claims that are in that committee, which I am told by its clerk is already more than 2,000, it will cut off the consideration of other claims; because these war claims are always of a contested character and meet with more or less opposition in the House.

This proposition of the Committee on War Claims is simply asking us to surrender private-bill day to that committee and to that only. I introduced in the Fifty-first Congress, and had it referred to the Committee on Rules, a proposition to alternate these days just as my friend from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] now proposes, giving the fifth day of every month to the other committees of a private character, except War Claims, thus giving them two days in every month. The committee did not report that rule, and we were unable afterwards to have any consideration of other private bills. If members here expect to have their bills passed they ought to arrange it so that there shall be a division of time between these committees. It is not my purpose to detain the House at any length, because I think the justice of such a rule and such a division of time as is contemplated by this amendment should commend itself to every member as soon as his attention is challenged to the facts that call for such a division.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, not only is every word true that has been uttered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MANSUR], but they have not told the whole of the truth.

Mr. MANSUR. We did not have time.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. Not only is it a fact that the War Claims Committee practically blocked everything of a private nature in the last House, but it is also true that they withdrew a large number of bills farther down upon the Calendar and had them introduced as one omnibus bill, and that committee secured more legislation of a private nature in the last Congress than all the remaining committees of the House put together. Now, I think a division of this thing is only fair.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana does not reach the real difficulty. There is nothing more dishonest than the manner in which Congress treats the consideration of private bills. Year after year the claims of these poor people are presented, only to be referred to a committee, reported back, placed on the Calendar, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] once eloquently said, to be placed in a glass case so that the mourners may look at the remains. [Laughter.]

The thousands of bills introduced each session of Congress, and reintroduced in every Congress, are my evidence—just claims due by the Government and to people suffering to-day from poverty. It is absolutely dishonest, and for the reason that Congress does not make an honest effort to afford relief to these people.

Mr. WALKER. You have just passed a resolution providing that we shall not pay them—the Holman resolution.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. The proper course to take with private bills would be to take them out of Congress and send them to the courts, or else hold sufficient sessions to consider them. Why could you not hold morning sessions for the consideration of private bills? It is a fact only those would come here who are interested, and when objection is raised a bill would have to be set aside and other bills taken up. That is one way in which you could do it; the objectionable bills could be killed and the just ones passed. Let the Committee on Claims formulate a bill by which all these bills could be sent to a proper court and taken out of Congress. You could then dispense with your sessions. Members say nothing can be done at these morning sessions; the same objection will apply to all sessions.

I have seen men in this House hour after hour fighting a small bill, and when you ask them what objection they have to this bill, which is only for a small amount, they will say, "Ah, my dear sir, it is not that small bill, but there are others away down on the line which we want to kill," and through that cowardly spirit they stand in the way of and throttle all private legislation. That is the history of Congress year in and year out. There is no question that will come before the House that is more important, or one that gentlemen can afford to give more time to, or one by which they may better convince the people of a desire to do justice to them. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I demand the previous question.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. But I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The demand for the previous question cuts off amendments, and the question is on ordering the previous question.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 46, noes 87.

So the demand for the previous question was not agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. I desire to offer an amendment, which I will read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will send it to the Clerk's desk, so that it may be read.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. I offer it as a substitute for the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can not offer it as a substitute, as there is an amendment pending.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Let it be an amendment to the amendment—any way, so that it gets in there. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Every Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday, when there is a session on such days, there shall be a session of the House between the hours of 10 and 12 o'clock for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BYNUM. I make the point that that is not germane to the pending amendment. I do not want my amendment complicated by that, and the gentleman can offer it after my amendment has been disposed of.

Mr. REED (to Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri). You have a right to speak on your amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. I hope there will be no effort to close debate or force a vote upon this question. I have exercised a great deal of reserve force in keeping off these rules. [Laughter.] I had other amendments prepared, but out of sympathy for the chairman of the committee, and some little for the House, I have kept away from the question. I would not offer this but that it is my firm conviction, based on experience of several years, that its adoption will secure justice to many poor people and reflect deserved credit on our work, and my experience is longer than some gentlemen who do not appreciate this amendment.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Well, I was not left out long. "Time at last sets all things even." I know there is not a more important amendment or more just proposition that can be brought before this House than this very question, and if I am exceedingly in earnest it is due to the conviction that I am intensely in the right.

If you mean to do any sort of justice to those people you will take up this proposition and act upon it. If the days suggested do not suit you, change them, but do not say that you are giving them one day a week when your proposed rule only says, "It is in order on Friday to make a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar." You know if that motion is voted down it ends the day for private bills, and I have seen it violated so often that it practically means no day whatever. The practical result, is you have no consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. The calendars of former Congresses bear me out; barely a page would be considered and over 100 pages lost.

Now, by my proposition you will give them two hours each morning on three days of the week. Is that too much? Can there be any objection to that, in all fairness and reason? It does not interfere with any member's work. That is the pretext of men who seem blind to the fact that if busy they are not compelled to come, for private-bill day, like District of Columbia day, or the night for pension bills, seldom if ever develops a quorum. Now, I earnestly appeal to you to vote for my amendment and let it be adopted.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I only want to call the attention of the House to the statement made by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] that the Committee on War Claims blocked the business of this House for three months during the last Congress, and to state that the gentleman from New Jersey either does not understand what occurred in the last House or he does not state it correctly. I say that for eighteen weeks the Committee on Appropriations, the Committee on Rules, the Committee on Elections, or some other privileged committee or privileged motion, occupied the time on each Friday so that the Private Calendar was not considered, because the majority here saw proper to take up and consider other subjects.

Mr. BYNUM. Will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. ENLOE. Certainly.

Mr. BYNUM. Was not that obstruction thrown in because there were a lot of old war claims thrown into one bill, or, rather, a large number of bills were combined in one?

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. That is the situation.

Mr. ENLOE. Claims for quartermaster's stores and supplies, favorably reported by the Court of Claims, were embraced in one bill, and the gentleman from Indiana, I suppose, knows that nearly every Democrat in the House at that time sustained the Committee on War Claims, and, upon the demand for the yeas and nays, voted almost every Friday to take up the Private Calendar, in order to dispose of that omnibus bill. And furthermore, the Speaker of the House, through the organization under his control, for eighteen weeks denied the Committee on War Claims and denied to the House an opportunity to consider any business that was on the Private Calendar at that time, and yet when the omnibus bill came up to be voted on it passed with only seven or eight members of the House voting against it.

Now, it said that these claims ought not to be considered, at least they ought to be discriminated against, because there are a great many of them that are chronic cases. I want to say, that it is evidence that there is some merit in a claim when it can live before Congress for twenty-five or thirty years, and the claimant refuses to accept the action of one Congress as a final determination of his rights, and still appeals and hopes that some time in the history of this Government there will be an American Congress that will fairly consider war claims.

Now, these claims that have been here for a number of years are not necessarily claims without merit. Their age does not signify anything of that kind, but it does signify that we have had in Congress an unjust prejudice against this class of claims. Many of these claimants have gone to their graves without having obtained justice from this Government, and there is no place in this Capitol where there are so many unfortunates to be seen as around the Committee on War Claims, poor claimants who have been here for years asking for justice at the hands of this great and beneficent Government, and so often disappointed that many of them have been reduced to poverty and want and others have become insane.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. Those who listened attentively to what I said awhile ago will remember that I commenced by saying that the statements made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MANSUR] were true. In that I referred to the blocking of business here by the Committee on War Claims. I did not mean to say that the committee itself did it; but I did mean to say, and I now reassert—because I was here and I did understand what was going on—that it was because of the business of the Committee on War Claims that business was stopped.

Mr. ENLOE. It was because the Committee on War Claims desired to have considered measures which the majority here did not see proper to consider, and so the majority took advantage of the opportunity under the rules to throw in its privileged business to prevent the consideration of those measures.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. I have established what I said, or what I meant to say, Mr. Speaker, and I think the House understands it, and those who were here at the time to which I refer understand it.

And now I want to say one thing further. If it be true, as stated by the gentleman from Tennessee, that the Committee on War Claims has taken the action of committing its bills to its separate members, authorizing each of them, where they find that a bill has been favorably reported in a previous Congress, to report that bill to the House without any of the facts in the case being investigated by the full committee, there will probably be another block along the line.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, in connection with this debate, and before the vote is taken on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, I want to invite the attention of this House to one other matter in connection with the consideration of war claims and the way in which bills from the War Claims Committee were dealt with at the last Congress. I want to invite attention to the fact that the various items composing what was called the "omnibus bill" of the last Congress, consisted entirely of claims which had passed the Court of Claims in this city, and were just as nearly in the shape of a judgment as any award that a court can render against the United States. I want to call attention also to the fact that before that bill—doing tardy justice to the claimants—could be passed into law, an amendment was put upon it sending those cases again to the Court of Claims, and giving the Attorney-General the right to retry every one of them. So that, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on War Claims did not monopolize the business of this House, but their bill was blocked by obstruction here, and, representing people who do have war claims against this Government—just claims that have stood for thirty years and knocked at the doors of Congress, asking for honest treatment at the hands of this Government—I must protest against the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, and ask this House to give the reports from all committees a hearing as they are reached on the Calendar, and not to allow the option of taking up the bills of one committee on one Friday, and jumping about like a Kansas grasshopper and taking up the bills of another committee on another Friday. Take them in the order in which they are on the Calendar, and let them stand on the Calendar in the order in which they are reported from the committees. Then, if the committee reporting a bill fails, as the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] suggests, to give you facts justifying a vote for the measure or measures, vote against them.

Mr. STONE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the fact that this discussion has come in at this time is evidence to this House that there is action needed which will hasten the consideration of these measures. One of two things should be done, and should be done now. This Congress should prepare a way by which these claims can be gotten rid of, or else it should abolish these committees. I, sir, have had the honor, if honor it may be termed, to have served longer upon the Committee on War Claims than any other member of this House. I was appointed upon it in the Forty-ninth Congress. I had an idea when I was appointed upon that Committee, as I should have had if I had gone upon any other committee, that my business was to work, and I have followed up that work and stuck to it with a diligence that I think ought to have produced some result.

Gentlemen say that these claims are getting old and stale, that they are becoming chronic. Please ask yourselves, gentlemen, why they have become chronic. It is simply because you have held out to the people of this country the idea that under a certain condition of things they should have a right to come to Congress and demand to be paid for property or services, and then after they have come here and made their claims you have treated them with contempt. In the House of Representatives and in the Senate of the United States you have given it to be understood, by your laws, that a citizen of the United States had a right to present his claim and that the representatives of the people here would fairly consider it; but, Mr. Speaker, it has been the effort of the gentlemen who have come forward as leaders upon both sides of this House to arrange, and they have made their arrangements systematically, to defeat legislation upon these claims.

That can not be successfully denied by anybody; and instead of providing for an alternation of days between the Committee on Claims and the Committee on War Claims, the business of this House is either to abolish both these committees, saying to those who have these claims to present, "You can not come here asking for justice;" or else to take, like men, such action as will enable justice to be done and permit these claims to be acted upon, the bad ones to be rejected, the honest and just ones to be paid.

Mr. Speaker, the delusive hopes which have been held out to the people by Congress in regard to the payment of these claims have carried many persons to the poorhouse and to the insane asylum. Over here at St. Elizabeth you will find persons who came here and spent the last dollar that they could raise, either from their own means or with the assistance of their friends, in an effort to get just claims allowed.

Why, sir, the widow of Col. Kearney, a brother of Gen. Kearney, who fell in defense of the Union, has a claim against this Government—a perfectly just claim—for more than $20,000. She has been willing for years to accept $5,000 in settlement of this claim, in order that she might be enabled to live in something like comfort. Day after day that old woman totters to the doors of this Hall, calls out some member of this committee, and with tears streaming down her face begs to be paid the pittance due her for property that the Government of the United States took and used in the suppression of the rebellion.

Yet gentlemen talk about these claims growing "stale." I have shown how they grow "stale." You spend more money in equipping a committee, in doing its printing, in printing these bills and reports and having them laid before the House—you spend more money at each session of Congress in this way uselessly and vainly than you spend in paying these just demands. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STONE of Kentucky. I would like a minute or two more.

Mr. BUSHNELL and others asked that the time of Mr. STONE of Kentucky be extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. STONE of Kentucky. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that while I am not in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, I am in favor of this House taking action on this question to-day. Let it be done now while you are on these rules. Abolish both of these committees or else give an opportunity for the consideration of these matters. I have reported bills from the Committee on War Claims, providing for the establishment of a court for the consideration of these questions, taking them away from Congress and submitting them to judicial investigation, the claimant being represented by his attorney and the Government by its attorney.

But gentlemen of the legal profession, gentlemen who make law their study and their living, object to letting these questions go before the courts. I have a reverence for the courts. I believe that through the action of the courts the rights and liberties of the people are maintained. Not being a lawyer, I am willing to trust the courts upon questions of this kind. I say that the only thing you can do is either to give these people an opportunity to be heard in the courts, or in the name of all that is just and right give them a chance before your committees and in this House.

Mr. Speaker, not being a lawyer I do not know why I have been placed upon this Committee on War Claims. My business through life has not been the consideration of other people's claims, but the consideration of what little claim I might have upon "mother earth" to yield me a living. But I have been placed upon the Committee on War Claims; and I have also been regarded as so far versed in the science of war that the Speaker of this House has given me an honorable position upon the Committee on the Militia, because, I suppose, my walking qualities are so superior. [Laughter.] But be that as it may, I am deprived of any opportunity to exhibit my competency in the line of the militia, because the negotiations with Chile have settled the war question, and the militia is not likely to be called out.

But, sir, to be serious, I desire to raise my voice in behalf of those American citizens who have been led to believe that they had a right to come to Congress with their claims, but who on coming here have been treated with contempt by the representatives of the people. I say to gentlemen who have had no experience as members of any past Congress that before this Congress is ended, if these rules as now proposed go into effect, you will be obliged to write many letters to your constituents who have claims here, endeavoring to shift the blame for the failure of those claims from your shoulders to the shoulders of somebody else. I ask you not to put yourselves in that position. Let us do what is right to-day, and give these people a chance. [Applause.]

Mr. MANSUR. Mr. Speaker, I hope that nothing I may say will be construed as evincing any animosity on my part toward war claims. My object has been simply to secure such a distribution of time in this House that recent claims, fresh claims, originating in the daily conduct of the Government with parties who are pressing them upon us, may have a fair hearing. It is not that war claims are entitled to any more consideration than private or domestic claims, or that the latter are entitled to more consideration than war claims; but in our experience in this House we have found, especially in the last Congress, that war claims have been largely antagonized, almost to the entire exclusion of any hearing for other private claims.

I have just been down to consult with the clerk of the Committee on Private Claims. We find, and I agree with him, that we have reported nearly 600 bills in the last Congress, and he says that from the best track he has been able to keep of them he thinks that but few over 10 of these bills ever became laws. I told him I thought his estimate was too small. But to the best of my judgment we did not pass over 25 bills, private and domestic claims, from that committee in the last Congress. Now, Mr. Speaker, the business of that committee has grown in the last two years, or since the Forty-ninth Congress, from 1,700 bills to 2,700 in the last Congress, and this increase has been brought about from the fact that there is no other recourse for private claimants against the Government except through this committee to Congress. And these fresh claims are in the hands of living people. War claims are largely in the interest of heirs and attorneys, and while I will say nothing whatever against them or their justice, yet it does seem to me that the living ought to have at least half of our allotted time in the consideration of these matters.

Mr. ENLOE. Let me say to the gentleman that most of the war claimants are living.

Mr. MANSUR. Well, many of them are, no doubt; but a very large number of the claims are in the hands of their heirs or attorneys. It is not my purpose to impugn the justice of their claims.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question? If you think the living claimants ought to have so much consideration, why have you been pressing so earnestly for some time past the French spoliation claims?

Mr. MANSUR. Because it was given to me in my committee as a duty to look into these claims by a vote of the House and of my committee. It became my duty to look after them, and I performed it to the best of my ability. Let me say to the gentleman that these spoliation claims, although they are old and have had ninety years of waiting, have had fifty reports in their favor, with but three or four against them in that whole time. This indicates I should think that they must have had a good deal of vitality, as well as founded on a large amount of justice.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are many of these unsettled claims that meet my highest sympathy and judgment. When I first entered upon my duty as a member of the Committee on Claims five years ago, after twenty-five years' practice as a lawyer in the West where limitation laws are short, these stale claims when presented had a singular effect upon me. I felt a desire to shut myself up against them and wondered why they had lingered so long. But when I had become familiar with the manner that private claims are treated here, the thing was clearly explained to me. There are a host of these claims which have no political influence or paid attorneys behind them. They rest upon their own individual merit and the justice involved in them, and as a necessary consequence they are shoved out of the way. Only those claims receive attention in committee or in Congress that a member presses upon its attention.

In conclusion, I desire to say frankly to the House, Mr. Speaker, that if members expect to pass any private bills, our experience during the last Congress makes it clear that there ought to be some rule by which a division of time may be had between these committees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Before the vote is taken I desire to be heard again briefly on the question.

I desire to say to the new members of this House that if some provision is not made now, as the session progresses they will appreciate the novelty of seeing that open space in front of the Speaker's stand filled with members standing up and holding their little bills in their hands and appealing to the Speaker for recognition for unanimous consent to call up a private bill. Every one of the older members of the House know what I state to be true, and yet it seems that the only way to bring it home to some of our members would be for some member who having the courage to become a martyr to principle would stand right in the breach and absolutely stop all unanimous consents until you either provided by law to send all these bills to the courts or else compelled you to give sufficient time for their consideration, if you will persist in pretending to consider them.

What reason is there why you gentlemen can not give three mornings in the week to the consideration of these private claims? You will have still three mornings left for your committee work, and most of you who were, I believe, members of State Legislatures before you came here well remember that you had your two sessions daily, morning and afternoon, and accomplished all the committee work besides. The trouble is you do not do work enough. [Laughter.] You do not stay in session long enough. About three hours each afternoon comprises your time, and with the liberal allowance of an hour to each speaker, what time is there for the actual work of legislation? The misfortune to the people is that too much time is taken for debate and too little given for actual work. I insist upon the adoption of the amendment and hope the House, will sustain me and have these poor claimants feel that the Government is honest, that its representatives are honest, and that we at least make an honest effort to pay debts due by the Government to its citizens.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Let us have the amendment read again.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore decided that it was rejected.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri and Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey demanded a division.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Pending the division, I ask that the amendment be read again. There seems to be a misapprehension in the minds of the gentlemen as to what they are voting upon.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. I misunderstood the amendment, and withdraw the call for the division.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri also demanded a division.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 60, noes 74.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Let us have tellers.

Tellers were refused.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Then I make the point that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under what rule does the gentleman make the point?

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. REED. The Speaker will have to count.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not understand the gentleman has any right to make that point.

Mr. BURROWS. Oh, there must be a quorum here.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Well, I call for the yeas and nays, to see how many members are willing to go on record.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 86, nays 132, not voting 113; as follows:

Mr. MCCREARY. In what respect does this differ from the other amendment offered by the gentleman, which was voted down?

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. In makes the morning sessions on two days of the week instead of three. I understand this will be satisfactory to the House. [Laughter.]

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment proposed by Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri, the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a resolution adopted by the Business Men's Association of Norfolk, Va., favoring the proposed transfer of the Revenue Marine Service to the Navy Department; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ALLEN. I present a petition of the county commissioners of Pierce County, State of Washington. This is the county in which the city of Tacoma is situated. The petition sets forth that this is a county of 65,000 population, of which Tacoma is the principal city. It recites an empire of wealth contained within the county, and then proceeds to state that immediately adjoining the city of Tacoma, at the head of Commencement Bay, lies the Puyallup Indian Reservation, a body of land about 4 by 6 miles, embracing from eighteen to twenty thousand acres.

This reservation lies between the city of Tacoma and the towns, the agricultural lands, coal mines, and timber lands of the county. The petition recites that in order to reach Tacoma it is absolutely necessary that highways be made across the Indian reservation, and the county has imposed upon itself during the present year a tax of $63,000 for this purpose. The Indians themselves, who by allotment have become citizens, are as importunate for these roads as anyone, and yet this great scope of country is exempt from taxation and stands as an incubus against the development of the county and the rapidly growing city of Tacoma. The prayer of the petition is that the restrictions placed upon the alienation, of this land may be removed, in order that the city and county may have a legitimate development.

Owing to the importance of the petition, I move that it be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

rollment act of 1863 who paid $300 in money for substitues; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR PLUMB.

Mr. PEFFER. I desire to offer a resolution. In explanation of it I wish to say that an order was entered some time ago naming the 20th day of this month for special services in memory of the late Senator Plumb, but upon consultation with a number of Senators who expect to take part in the exercises we have concluded to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to change the day to the 18th from the 20th.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Kansas will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the order heretofore entered naming Saturday, the 20th day of the present month, for special services in memory of the late Preston B. Plumb, be changed to Thursday, the 18th day of the present month.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

WEST VIRGINIA DIRECT TAX.

Mr. FAULKNER. Yesterday, in the absence of both the senior and junior Senators from Virginia, the joint resolution (S. R. 9) to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the governor of the State of West Virginia the sum appropriated by the act of Congress entitled "An act to credit and pay to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia all moneys collected under the direct tax levied by the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861," was passed by the Senate without objection from anyone. I understand that the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] has been sick and desires especially to consult with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] in reference to that measure before it is finally taken out of the possession of the Senate.

I feel, under these circumstances, that it is due to those gentlemen that I should enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed, with a direction to recall the joint resolution from the other House, to which it has been sent, I understand. I do not ask any action upon the motion to reconsider, but simply that it be entered under the rule so as to protect all the rights of these gentlemen in any action they may deem proper to take upon it after they have consulted upon the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia asks that the joint resolution described by him, No. 9, shall be recalled from the House of Representatives, and that a motion to reconsider the vote passing the same be entered. It will be so ordered unless there is objection.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to state in this connection that I was detained from my seat yesterday by the affliction of a neighbor at whose house I felt called upon to be in attendance. Otherwise I would have been here at the time. The action of the Senator from West Virginia is entirely satisfactory. He had no idea that there was any impropriety in permitting the joint resolution to pass without objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1604) to provide for the creation of a fourth judicial district in the Territory of Utah.

SENATOR FROM FLORIDA.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution in relation to the contested seat from Florida.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution reported by Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, January 25, 1892, as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. Wilkinson Call, of Florida, was duly elected by the Legislature of the said State on the 26th day of May, 1891, a Senator of the United States from said State for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1891, and that he is lawfully entitled to a seat in the Senate.

Mr. TURPIE. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the reading of the report, which is very brief.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the report submitted by Mr. TURPIE January 25, 1892, as follows:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the papers, evidence, and certificates in the case of Wilkinson Call, and of the contestant, R. H. M. Davidson, respecting the question of a title to a seat in this body for the State of Florida, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Hon. Wilkinson Call, of Florida, was duly elected by the Legislature of the said State on the 26th day of May, 1891, a Senator of the United States from said State for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1891, and that he is lawfully entitled to a seat in the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the reading of the report made by the Senator from Indiana, Report No. 106, part 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks for the reading of the report, which will be read by the Chief Clerk.

The Chief Clerk read the report submitted by Mr. TURPIE February 1, 1892, as follows:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred the papers in the case of R. H. M. Davidson, contestor, against Wilkinson Call, contestee, concerning the right to a seat in this body for the State of Florida, have had the same under consideration, and have instructed me to make the following report:

In April, 1891, the Legislature of the State of Florida met and was duly organized at the time and place appointed by law. On the second Tuesday after such organization, being the 21st day of April, 1891, the two chambers of which it was composed held a session and voted, each separately, for the election of a United States Senator. No one was chosen at this election, and it was so declared and entered upon the journals of the respective houses. On the following day, being Wednesday, the 22d of April aforesaid, the Legislature met at noon in joint assembly, and one vote was taken for Senator, which resulted in no election. And on every succeeding day, except Sundays, until the 26th day of May, 1891, they met and took one vote in the same manner, with the same result. On the 26th day of May, 1891, the joint assembly met as before, and upon a vote being taken for United States Senator it was found that Wilkinson Call had received a majority of the votes of those present and voting, the same being also a majority of all the members elected to both houses of the Legislature. Thereupon Mr. Call was declared duly elected.

The validity of this election is questioned upon the ground that there was not a quorum of the State senate present and voting at the time it occurred. This objection is based upon the position that the joint convention or assembly in such cases is composed of the two houses as such, and that therefore a quorum of each must attend to properly form such convention. The law of the case is found in the act of Congress of July 25, 1866, being chapter 1, Title II, of the Revised Statutes, concerning the election of United States Senators, an act adopted by the constitution of the State of Florida in respect to such elections, and so in a double sense to be regarded as the law of this case. But if the constitution of Florida had provided in express terms that a quorum of both houses was necessary to constitute a joint assembly this would not be the law unless the same is required by said act of 1866. The Federal law is paramount.

This act provides that "the members of the two houses shall convene in joint assembly," etc. The joint assembly is thus composed not of the two houses, but of the members thereof. The joint assembly is not a junction or union of the two houses as such; it is not a merger of the two houses into one of either; but it is a body distinct and separate from either as such, and has by the words of the enactment a quorum of its own prescribed and defined, to wit, "a majority of all the members elected to both houses," without any reference to a quorum either of the senate or the house. The joint assembly is authorized and created by the act of Congress, and when the circumstances have transpired which make it necessary to convene the same, all the members of both houses, without any reference to the further action of either house as such, are entitled to seats in it, and may join together and coöperate as members in the choice of a Senator until one is elected. It has always been conceded that the object of the statute of 1866 was to prevent the inaction or neglect of either house, that is, of a majority or quorum of either house, from delaying or defeating the will and voice of the majority of the whole legislative body.

The two houses, as such, are given their day in court—are given, under a previous provision of the act, an opportunity to make the choice of Senator. After they have failed to make a choice, to hold that a quorum of each is necessary to make a joint assembly is to give them a chance to repeat this failure—it is to vitiate the very purpose of the enactment and to reinstate the evil which it was designed to remedy. It was not the intention of the makers of the law of 1866 to place or leave it in the power of any minority of the whole number, or of a quorum in either house, as such, to prevent or postpone the representation of the State in this body. For this reason the law operates, so far as it relates to the joint meeting, upon members as individuals, not as component parts of the respective bodies to which they may belong; and for this reason also a majority of the whole number of members is constituted the quorum of the joint assembly; that is, the number requisite to transact its business in the Senatorial election. If the minority of the members, absent at the time of Mr. Call's election, had all been present and voted, this would not have changed the result. It seems unreasonable, under the provisions of this statute or any other, to give a greater effect to the absence and nonaction of this minority than to their presence and action.

It seems yet more unreasonable to hold that a quorum of the Senate, in Florida seventeen members, should defeat the action of thrice their number under a statute designed expressly to provide for the permanent and, as far as practical, the continuous representation of the States in the Senate of the United States.

It is implied in the argument made against the right of the contestee that this construction of the act is in conflict with the section of the Constitution which provides that Senators shall be chosen by the Legislature—that this is composed of two houses—and that a quorum of each is practically and legally the house; that without a quorum there is no house. We grant that the quorum is in legal effect the house. But the term legislature in this clause is not to be construed technically with reference to the separate chambers which may exist within it, but as designating the collective number of all the persons composing it. This is clear from the fact that one of the States at least, Pennsylvania, had at the time of the adoption of the Constitution only one legislative chamber. Besides this, the word legislature is commonly used in this way, as the word magistracy is used and indeed is defined to mean "the body of magistrates" in a State or country. Legislature in this section means the body of legislators of the State without reference to the different chambers, as such, in which they may serve. The joint assembly, created by the act of 1866, is thus in the fullest sense of the term the Legislature of the State, its whole number being equal to that of all the persons elected to either branch of the Legislature, and its quorum being a majority of that number.

In these views the recent decisions of the Senate agree.

The Legislature of Florida is composed of a house of 68 and a senate of 32 members, in all 100. Fifty-two members attended the joint assembly of the 26th of May aforesaid, were present, and voted. Mr. Call received of this number the votes of 51. So that the joint assembly contained and the person chosen received the votes of a majority of all the members elected to both houses.

We are therefore of the opinion that Mr. Call was duly elected.

The appointment by the governor thereafter of Mr. Davidson, under the erroneous supposition that a vacancy existed in the office of United States Senator, was an act of mere irrelevancy which it is not necessary further to notice.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, this report made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] represents the unanimous sentiment of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The subject was fully and carefully considered by the committee, and an argument was made by very able counsel, Mr. Eppa Hunton, of Virginia, against Mr. Call, the sitting member, and in favor of Mr. Davidson, the contestant. In the course of the investigation I made certain inquiries, and the results I deem of sufficient importance to be submitted to the Senate and to be made of record in the discussion of the case.

The question which has arisen is one that has been heard of before and is liable to be heard of again, and it is desirable that by this report, by such discussion as may be had, and by the decision of the Senate the law shall be made so plain that future cases may not arise and that contestants may not hereafter come in a case like this to challenge the seat of any Senator who has been elected.

There were many considerations at one time or another addressed to different members of the committee, but the committee wisely concluded that this was not either a political question or a personal question, but a question of constitutional and statutory construction. I might as well say at this time, with reference to the contested election from the State of Idaho, as well as the contest in this Florida case, that the committee could not conceive themselves called upon to decide questions of the gravity which have arisen here according to any personal considerations whatever; that is to say, through any preference for one individual over another or any preference for one political party over another, and certainly, not through any preference for one individual of one party over another individual of the same party.

The facts in the case are very simple. The joint assembly was formed in the Florida Legislature on April 21. On the day before the two houses had complied with the law and voted separately, but there was no choice. On the next day the joint assembly was convened precisely in accordance with the requirements of the statute and there were 96 members present, the whole Legislature being composed of 100 members. A vote was taken as the statute requires, and there was no choice. The joint assembly adjourned, but continued to meet daily from the 22d of April until May 26 in exact and strict accordance with the requirements of the statute of Congress; and on the 26th of May the sitting member [Mr. CALL] was chosen in the joint assembly, having 51 votes out of the 100 members, but it so happened that only 15 out of the 32 members of the Senate were present. The sole and simple question is thus presented in this case, unembarrassed by any other question, whether the mere absence of a quorum of one house, provided a majority of all the members of both houses are present, is sufficient to defeat an election of United States Senator.

Now, Mr. President, in the absence of any question of constitutional power, this point would seem to be settled conclusively by the United States statute on that subject. The language of the statute I will read. The act of 1866 became embodied in the Revised Statutes, and section 15 provides that the election of a Senator, which by the previous section is to take place on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization of the Legislature, shall be conducted in the following manner. I ask the attention of Senators to the language in order that they may form an opinion whether there can be any escape from the construction of the statute, without now considering whether or not the statute is constitutional.

Each house shall openly, by a viva voce vote of each member present, name one person for Senator in Congress from said State, and the name of the person so voted for, who shall have a majority of the whole number of votes cast in each house, shall be entered on the journal of each house by the clerk or the secretary thereof; but if either house shall fail to give such majority to any person on said day, that fact shall be entered on the journal.

Those are the statutory requirements as to the joint meeting on Tuesday.

At 12 o'clock meridian of the day following that on which proceedings are required to take place, as aforesaid, the members of the two houses shall convene in joint assembly, and the journal of each house shall then be read, and if the same person shall have received a majority of all the votes in each house, such person shall be declared duly elected Senator to represent said State in the Congress of the United States; but if the same person shall not have received a majority of the votes in each house, or if either house shall have failed to take proceedings as required by this act, the joint assembly shall then proceed to choose, by a viva voce vote of each member present, a person for the purpose aforesaid, and the person having a majority of all the votes of the said joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both houses being present and voting, shall be declared duly elected.

Mr. President, it can hardly be supposed that it would be contended before the Committee on Privileges and Elections and before the Senate that these last words mean not a majority of the members elected to both houses, but a majority of the members elected to each house; and yet that was the contention before the committee, and the arguments submitted by the counsel for Mr. Davidson asserted that the true construction of this statute was that there should have been, in order to constitute a legal election, not, as there was in this case, 51 being a majority of 100, a majority of the members elected to both houses, but a majority of the members elected to each house of the Florida Legislature.

Mr. President, this statute was very carefully enacted in 1866. It was made, as has always been conceived, for the very purpose of preventing a bare majority of one house of the Legislature from preventing the election of a Senator. The act was drafted by Senator Daniel Clark, of New Hampshire, and was by him conducted to its passage. Mr. Clark was a lawyer of strong and acute intellectual powers, of great legal learning and ability, and his career as a lawyer, as a Senator, and as a judge conferred great honor upon New Hampshire. With care he drew this statute; with patience and with assiduity he labored to make it a law. He knew the dangers it was intended to avoid, and he meant to make a law that would compel the States to keep their Senatorial seats full and prevent a bare majority of the smaller branch of a State Legislature from defeating a Senatorial election.

At this time New Hampshire had a State senate of only twelve members, but it had about four hundred members in its house of representatives. Senator Clark meant to make a law which would prevent any seven members out of the four hundred and twelve from breaking up a Senatorial election in New Hampshire, and there never has been much doubt that he succeeded in making such a law.

This act of 1866 was reported by Senator Clark on July 9, as appears by the Globe of the first session, Thirty-ninth Congress, part 4, page 3664. It was taken up on the 11th of July, 1866, and discussed, and the discussion is contained in part 4 of the Globe of that session, between pages 3727 and 3734, and the bill passed on that day.

In the House of Representatives, as appears by part 5 of the Globe, page 4063, on the 23d of July, 1866, Mr. WILSON of Iowa, the present Senator from that State, moved the previous question on the bill, and a motion was made by Mr. Le Bland to lay on the table. That motion was negatived—yeas 21, nays 87. The bill passed by a vote of 78 ayes, the noes not being counted.

The discussion which took place in the Senate shows as conclusively as the language of the statute itself the unmistakable purpose of the legislators who enacted it. I desire to read from some portion of the debate, which was participated in by Senators Clark, Fessenden, Trumbull, Williams, Anthony, Sumner, Saulsbury, Guthrie, Garrett Davis, SHERMAN, the present Senator from Ohio, Howe, Reverdy Johnson, and Henderson of Missouri.

The debate all through proceeds upon the theory of the unlimited control over Senatorial elections by the Congress of the United States, except as restrained by the Constitution as to the place of choosing the Senators. Senator Trumbull, on page 3727, said:

I will say further that the committee were unanimous in regard to this bill. It is a bill the want of which has been felt ever since I have been a member of Congress whenever a contested election has arisen; and such cases have most frequently arisen out of the difficulty of the two houses of a Legislature meeting together. It has always been considered desirable that Congress should pass some law on the subject, and I think the Judiciary Committee, of which I have been a member for the last eight or ten years, in discussing this matter have always agreed that it was desirable that Congress should pass some law on the subject and avoid those contests that arise from the fact that a factious opposition in one branch of the Legislature or the other sometimes prevents the two houses from meeting together.

Senator Guthrie of Kentucky was entirely clear as to the power. He said:

Mr. President, I believe the Constitution provides that we may pass such a law as this in order to produce uniformity in the mode of electing Senators to this body; and, therefore, I can see no constitutional objection to the legislation proposed.

Senator Guthrie further said:

I would have very little objection to this bill if it merely provided for an election by a joint vote of the two houses, whether they were brought into the same room to vote, or whether the votes were cast in separate rooms and compared by a committee, as is done in Kentucky. There is very little difference between those two modes.

Senator Davis of Kentucky urged that there should be no provision in the bill for a vote in the separate houses on the first day. He said:

I think the last is the simplest rule and the most practical.

That is to say, a joint ballot or a joint vote in the two houses at first.

That rule would always, or nearly always, result in the choice of a Senator. The rule, though, provided here for controlling the election on the first day practically would not produce an election at all, because it would often occur that the same man would not get a majority of the votes of each house. Why, then, postpone the election from the first to the second or subsequent day? Why not adopt the rule for the first day's voting that is adopted for the subsequent day's voting, and proceed to an election upon the simplest rule and in the shortest time practicable?

Senator SHERMAN of Ohio was in favor of the rule as adopted by the committee and embodied in the bill requiring a majority of the joint assembly or a majority of all the members elected to the two houses to be present when an election took place, but he advocated distinctly the plurality rule. I read from his statement on page 3732:

I suggest to my friend from Wisconsin whether it would not be a great deal better to substitute a plurality rule after a certain number of ballots. ["No." "No."] Then you will have difficulty. Under this bill I believe that after all the members have disclosed their preferences either ambitious or corrupt minorities, factions, may defeat an election, may prevent any business being done, and may create just the very condition of things that occurred once in Ohio when they almost got to fighting each other, and which occurred twice in the House of Representatives, when, if it had not been for the adoption of the plurality rule when General Banks was elected Speaker, we should never have organized the House; and if it had not been for the withdrawal of one of the candidates in the other case to which I have referred there would not have been an organization then. We shall get in the same difficulty here that we had in the House of Representatives on those occasions.

Moreover, Mr. President, in the course of the debate the very question was raised which is stated by counsel in behalf of Mr. Davidson, that it is not competent for the Congress of the United States, in passing a law regulating the election of United States Senators, to prescribe what shall be the quorum of the joint assembly. This point was made by Senator Henderson, of Missouri.

Mr. HENDERSON. In lines 29 and 30 of the first section I move to strike out the words "a majority of all the members elected to both houses being present and voting." I do not see that we have a right here to determine what shall be the Legislature of a State. The Constitution provides that Senators shall be chosen in each State by the Legislature. Suppose the Legislature of a State is composed, as was once the case in Pennsylvania, of only one branch: there can be no doubt that the people of the State may by their constitution abolish their Senate, and have a Legislature composed of but one branch: I do not see that the Federal Government could interfere with it.

And after some further remarks he goes on to say as to the pending bill—

Thus it undertakes to prescribe what shall be a quorum of the Legislature. I apprehend that we have no authority to do that. All the authority we have on the subject is derived from the clause of the Constitution which empowers us to prescribe the time and manner (not the place) of choosing Senators. If we have a right to determine what shall be a quorum in the Legislature, we have the right to determine what the Legislature is, because the same clause that gives us the right to prescribe the time and manner also says that the Senator shall be elected by the Legislature. What is the Legislature, and who is to determine what the Legislature of a State is? Can Congress determine it? If Congress can determine it for the election of Senators, I do not see why it can not for purposes of legislation. Is there any difference? The Legislature is the body that makes the laws, and the Constitution says that the same Legislature shall elect Senators. In any State one-third of all the members elected to the Legislature may be declared a quorum to do business by its constitution; and yet here it is proposed to say that a majority of all the members elected must be present.

Even Mr. Henderson, in arguing that Congress had not the right to prescribe what should be a quorum of the joint assembly, argued in favor of a narrower rule than that adopted in the law, because he contended that where in a State a less number than a majority of each house might constitute a quorum for the purpose of legislation, a less number than the proposed statute prescribed might elect a Senator, and that it was not competent for Congress to forbid such a result. He said:

I do not think Congress has the right, in determining the manner of electing Senators, to go so far as to say what shall constitute a quorum of a State Legislature. There is the difficulty, and the only difficulty that I see in this bill. I think most clearly that that part of the bill ought to be stricken out, because if we can go to the extent of determining it we certainly can exercise a very dangerous power in determining what the Legislature of a State may be.

Here was an objection clearly and strongly put, and it was as distinctly answered by Senator Clark, who said:

I hope this amendment will not be agreed to.

Concerning the provision that a majority of both Houses should make a quorum, Mr. Clark proceeded to say:

It was put in here for the purpose of securing a majority of all the persons elected to both houses in case the Legislature came into convention, so that less than a majority should not be present at the meeting, or they should not elect when there was less than a majority present. I think it is a safe rule. There is a difference between the two houses assembled in joint convention for the purpose of an election and the two houses acting separately in their ordinary legislative capacity. It would be competent for them, undoubtedly, to prescribe their quorum in each house, but when they go into joint convention under the law of the United States for the purpose of electing a Senator, it seems to me entirely competent for the law of the United States to prescribe what shall be a quorum for that purpose.

Later, replying still further to Mr. Henderson, I read from what Mr. Clark said:

Mr. CLARK. When the Legislature undertakes to elect a Senator in the ordinary way of its transactions, that is, each house voting by itself, the bill does not propose to regulate what shall there be a quorum. The Legislature regulates that matter itself, or the State constitution regulates it. But when we provide that those two houses may quit their ordinary method of legislation and go into joint assembly for the purpose of election, then we provide what shall be a quorum in that joint assembly, that there shall be at least secured a majority of the two houses when they come to act together.

The amendment of Mr. Henderson was rejected, ayes 10, noes not counted, and immediately after Senator Williams is quoted as making an inquiry of Senator Clark, which I will read:

I should like to ask a question with reference to the language used in the twenty-ninth line of the first section. It reads: "And the person having a majority of all the votes of the said joint assembly, a majority of all the members elected to both houses being present and voting." Is it intended by that phraseology to require a majority of each house or a majority of both houses?

Mr. CLARK. A majority of both present. There is to be a majority of the two, counting them together as one body.

The bill then passed. The yeas and nays were called, which resulted—yeas 25, nays 11.

Mr. President, one would suppose under these conditions, the clear language of the Constitution, the debate which took place when the law was passed, and the practical construction of the statute ever since, that it could not be contended that when the law said a majority of both houses should be present it meant a majority of each house, and yet that is the argument which was adduced to the committee and constituted the whole of the contention which was made.

The argument thus made was attempted to be strengthened by the assertion that if the statute meant anything else than that a majority of each house should be necessary to constitute a joint assembly, then it was unconstitutional. This is a kind of argument that is often made. The contention was that the statute of 1866 must be held not to mean what the language plainly seems to mean, because it would be unconstitutional if it had such meaning. Courts have sometimes yielded to an argument of this sort, which is frequently addressed to them. They have sometimes held that a statute did not mean what it plainly appeared to mean, and thus saved its constitutionality, instead of deciding the statute to be void because of its unconstitutionality. But such decisions certainly do not commend themselves to sound lawyers, and in this case there is a very great difficulty in giving the position any force or effect whatever, for the reason, in the first place, that the language of the clause, taken in connection with the whole language of the statute, is so plain and clear, so distinct and unequivocal, that it is not possible to give it a different meaning even for the sake of avoiding a decision that the statute is unconstitutional.

In the next place, Mr. President, when an examination is made of the contention of the counsel for Mr. Davidson, that the statute is unconstitutional, there does not seem to be any reasonable foundation for any such claim. The argument was in substance this: That inasmuch as the Constitution of the United States provides that the election of Senators shall be made by the Legislature, and as Legislatures usually act by concurrent vote of the two houses, a quorum of each being present, therefore a statute which provides for the election of a United States Senator by a Legislature, the two houses sitting in joint assembly, but without a quorum of one house being absent, must be unconstitutional; in other words, the contestant says that a body so acting is not a Legislature.

Mr. President, this argument would have much force if Legislatures always acted concurrently and never acted in joint assembly, or if it could be shown that when a legislature has acted in joint assembly it has always or in the greater number of cases required the presence of a majority in each house to constitute a legal joint assembly. But this is not the fact. It is very far from being the fact. It has not been so often the fact as to give the argument in that direction that a joint assembly is not a Legislature unless a majority of each house is present any substantial foundation whatever.

Joint assemblies have been held in all the States, and if the contestant concedes that joint assemblies may be held for any purpose, then the position that the two houses are not a Legislature unless they act as they do when they legislate certainly falls to the ground, because whenever a joint assembly is held the superior power of a member of the smaller body over a member of the larger body, which prevails when laws are made, utterly disappears.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. What would the Senator say to this kind of a case: Suppose a Legislature is composed of ninety members, sixty members of the house and thirty members of the senate. The sixty members of the house, of course, would be a majority of all. Suppose that all the members of the senate declined to meet at the time appointed and all of the sixty members of the house did meet. Would that, in the opinion of the Senator from New Hampshire, be such a joint assembly as is contemplated by the statute, and could those sixty members, in the opinion of the Senator from New Hampshire, elect a Senator of the United States?

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, that question does not arise in this case.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am aware of that.

Mr. CHANDLER. But I am inclined to think under this statute of the United States, which is intended to be peremptory and to accomplish the election of a Senator, that when the day of the joint meeting arrives, and it is the duty of the members of the two houses to appear and perform the function of electing a United States Senator, if all the members of one house stay away, still there would be a valid election if there was a majority of the whole number of both houses present.

Mr. MITCHELL. On the principle that the law contemplates a meeting not of the Legislature as such or of the two houses as such, but of the members composing the Legislature?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly, as one joint assembly. The Senator will see as I progress that this subject of a joint assembly is not a new one; it is as old as the Constitution itself, and without undertaking to say that in the absence of a clear statute the house of representatives could meet and elect a senator, the senate staying away, I do not hesitate to say when you are dealing with a statute of the United States, a law of Congress made under the express authority of the Constitution, which fixes the place where the members of the Legislature are bound to go, that if any number of members stay away short of a majority of the whole, still there may be an election and a lawful election of a Senator of the United States. But the Senator can consider that question for himself when he comes to see what the precedents have been in connection with the joint assemblies of State Legislatures.

In this case, Mr. President, it is to be borne in mind that we had the two houses voting as separate bodies and no choice; we had the meeting of the joint assembly, and we had a lawful joint assembly for over thirty days, meeting every day and voting every day, and the question is simply whether at the end of thirty days seventeen out of the thirty-two State senators, by absenting themselves from the joint meeting, could destroy the validity of a joint assembly which had been performing its functions in strict obedience to the law of Congress day after day for more than thirty days. It is not possible that the seventeen members could thus paralyze the joint assembly once lawfully constituted under the act of Congress.

Mr. President, when the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] did me the honor to ask me a question, I was showing that in a joint assembly the power and force of a vote of a member of the smaller body is much less than it is when the two houses are legislating in the ordinary manner of legislation. When a joint assembly is held, even if a quorum of each house is present, there is a very radical departure from the method of making laws where each house must concur separately, and where a bare majority of the smaller house can prevent the passage of a law. In a joint assembly one member of the smaller house has no more power than one member of the larger house, whereas in making laws one member of the smaller house may have ten times the power of one member of the larger house.

So I repeat; if the argument for the contestant is good, that you never can have a joint assembly which can elect a Senator except as the Legislature makes laws, then you must destroy the whole system of electing Senators by joint assembly and must require the election of Senators to be made always by concurrent action of the two houses and by a majority vote of the members of each house; which even the counsel for the contestant in this case did not contend.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. CHANDLER. With pleasure.

Mr. STEWART. The difficulty has been, previous to the passage of this law, that one or the other house of a Legislature declined to go into joint convention. A great many incidents of that kind have occurred. I was a member of the Committee on the Judiciary at the time the law of 1860 was passed, reported by that committee. In looking over all the cases that came under our observation, we found that invariably one house went into joint convention and the other did not. The language of the act makes it the duty of the joint assembly to meet, whether the two houses have concurred or not, provided that if either house shall fail to pass a resolution for meeting, they shall notwithstanding meet in joint convention. Now, is it necessary, in order to give the joint convention jurisdiction, that one house must have acted? Has the Senator's attention been called to that point?

Mr. CHANDLER. Is that the Senator's question?

Mr. STEWART. That is my question. The statute makes it their duty to vote separately on the day previous, and then on the following day to go into joint convention. Suppose both houses fail to meet. Has a case of that kind been considered?

Mr. CHANDLER. If all the members of both houses fail to come to the joint assembly, then, of course, there will be no election of a Senator. There is a limit to the power of a law of Congress. You may lead a horse to water, but you can not make him drink. The question is not how a Senator can be elected if to the joint assembly nobody goes, but the question is, first, has Congress plenary power over this subject; and, secondly, if it has and fixes a time for a joint assembly, and says that such assembly may elect a Senator and fixes by statute the quorum of that joint assembly, may there not be a lawful election of Senator, even if all the members of one branch of the Legislature absent themselves.

Mr. STEWART. I do not think I made myself clearly understood.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, I am inclined to think from an examination of the United States Constitution and contemporary State constitutions that in such a case as I have supposed a valid election could be effected with all the members of one house absent.

Mr. STEWART. The act makes a joint assembly obligatory in certain cases. It makes it obligatory in case either house fails. The question is whether it makes it obligatory when both houses fail. In case both houses fail, does the joint convention get jurisdiction? Is not the action of one house or the other necessary to give the joint assembly jurisdiction to act at all under the law of Congress?

Mr. CHANDLER. Possibly it is. Possibly the law of Congress is defective in that particular. But as to the power, my investigations lead me to the conclusion that Congress has the power to make a law that shall provide for a meeting of the members of the Legislature on a given day, in a given building or room, in the town or city where the State has located its State capital, and may declare that those members of the Legislature then and there meeting, be they few or be they many, may by a majority vote or by a plurality vote choose a United States Senator.

Mr. STEWART. The question is, has Congress so declared?

Mr. CHANDLER. I am not certain that the language of the statute is broad enough to cover the case which the Senator mentions, but I am sure that the constitutional power to enact a law to cover the case which he mentions is broad enough.

The argument against the contention of the counsel for Mr. Davidson is that Congress has the power by law to make rules and regulations for the elections by the States of their United States Senators, and that this power is unlimited except in two particulars: Congress can not prescribe the place, that is, the town or city in the State where the election shall be made; nor can it provide for an election except by the Legislature. Those limitations are agreed to, but it is not agreed that the words "the Legislature" means the two houses. On the contrary, it is contended that the Constitution means the members of the Legislature acting under such regulations as Congress may by law prescribe, and inasmuch as at the adoption of the Constitution Legislatures of the States, while they always made the laws concurrently as separate bodies as the constitutions all prescribed, always performed election functions and conducted elections committed to them in joint assembly, the vote of every member of either house having the force and effect of any member of the other house, Congress may make a rule and regulation providing for the election of Senators by members of the Legislature in such a joint assembly and may, as a part of such rule and regulation, determine by law what shall be a quorum of such joint assembly and what proportion of such quorum shall be sufficient to effect a choice of Senator.

That, Mr. President, is my view of the constitutional authority of Congress, and the argument that has been advanced in the other direction, as it seems to me, falls entirely to the ground when we realize that joint assemblies were in existence in eleven of the thirteen original States when the Federal Constitution was adopted and that, therefore, the clause in the Constitution of the United States authorizing Congress to make regulations for the election of United States Senators is to be presumed to have reference to the existing state of affairs, which was, that while every constitution of a State having two branches in its Legislature provided that the State should only make laws by concurrent vote, it committed to a joint assembly of the State all the powers and functions which were conferred upon the Legislature in the matter of conducting elections, in either canvassing votes, or deciding between two when there was a tie vote, or electing such officers as by the constitution of the State were committed to the Legislature.

When you read the language of the Constitution in the light of the fact that at the adoption of the Constitution eleven of the States had carefully given to their Legislatures or the members of their Legislatures, in joint meeting, the whole business of conducting elections, while they had required the concurrent action of each of the two houses to make laws, you must conclude that when the Congress of the United States exercised the power which was given it of regulating the elections of United States Senators, it might provide for these joint assemblies, might prescribe the rules and regulations which should govern them, and might prescribe when and where at the State capital they should meet, and might declare the quorum with which an election of Senators should be valid, and might declare the number of members, the absence of whom from the joint assembly should prevent the election of a United States Senator.

Mr. President, I regret to take up so much of the time of the Senate, but I feel compelled in justice to the subject to call attention to the various clauses in the constitutions of the original thirteen States in connection with elections. I begin with the State of New Hampshire, which stood first on the list of the original thirteen States. The New Hampshire constitution of 1784 provided for the election of State senators, when there had been no election of State senators by the people, in the following manner:

> The members of the house of representatives and such senators as shall be declared elected, shall take the names of such persons as shall be found to have the highest number of votes in each district, and not elected, amounting to twice the number of senators wanting, if there be so many voted for; and out of these shall elect by joint ballot the number of senators wanted for such district.

My quotations are all from Maj. Ben: Perley Poore's Charters and Constitutions, and this page is 1285.

The votes of the people for governor, who was styled then the president of the State of New Hampshire, were to be laid before the senate and house of representatives by the secretary of state, on the first Wednesday in June to be by them examined.

The provision then was that in case of no election by a majority of votes—

> The house of representatives shall by ballot elect two out of the four persons who had the highest number of votes, if so many shall have been voted for; but if otherwise, out of the number voted for; and make return to the senate of the two persons so elected, on which the senate shall proceed by ballot to elect one of them, who shall be declared president.

That is on page 1288. On page 1290 there is the following provision:

> The secretary, treasurer, and commissary-general shall be chosen by joint ballot of the senators and representatives assembled in one room.

This is the constitution of 1784. On page 1301 the constitution of 1792 provides that the governor shall be chosen by popular vote, "and if no person shall have a majority of votes, the senate and house of representatives shall, by joint ballot, elect one of the two persons having the highest number of votes, who shall be declared governor," and from that time to this in New Hampshire the whole function of the Legislature in connection with elections has been exercised upon joint ballot.

The provisions in Massachusetts are very similar. The constitution of 1780, page 962, provides that when there is no choice of State senators, "the members of the house of representatives, and such senators as shall be declared elected, shall take the names of such persons as shall be found to have the highest number of votes in such district, and not elected, amounting to twice the number of senators wanting, if there be so many voted for, and out of these shall elect by ballot a number of senators sufficient to fill up the vacancies in such district."

This constitution of 1780, on page 964, it appears provided for the election of a governor when there had been no choice by the people, by the selection by the house of representatives of two from the four persons having the highest number of votes, from which two the State senate were to choose a governor; and a lieutenant-governor was to be elected in the same manner. But even in this constitution the various State officers were elected by a joint ballot of the senators and representatives in one room.

I read from page 968 the Massachusetts constitution of 1780:

Nine councillors shall be annually chosen from among the persons returned for councillors and senators, on the last Wednesday in May, by the joint ballot of the senators and representatives assembled in one room.

Article 1, chapter 2, provides:

The secretary, treasurer, and receiver-general, and the commissary-general, notaries public, and naval officers shall be chosen annually by joint ballot of the senators and representatives in one room.

In Rhode Island there was no constitution framed until after the Constitution of the United States was adopted.

By the Rhode Island Manual for 1890–'91, page 114, it appears that in 1696 the two houses of the General Assembly separated, but it also appears, page 133 of this Manual, that in June, 1790, the first United States Senators, Theodore Foster and Joseph Stanton, were elected in grand committee (no vote given).

In the public laws of Rhode Island, the revision of January, 1798, page 114, appears "An act regulating the manner of admitting freemen and directing the method of electing officers in this State."

On page 123 there is a duplicate section 13, as follows:

That all business of the annual general election shall be done and transacted by the General Assembly in a grand committee and not in separate houses.

In the same volume, page 126, there is "An act regulating the sitting of the General Assembly," of which section 2 is as follows:

That during the session of the General Assembly, the governor, lieutenant-governor, and assistants shall sit apart from the representatives of the several towns, and debate and vote in all public affairs of the State, and shall be called the Senate; and in the absence of the governor and lieutenant-governor the senior assistant present shall preside. That the representatives of the several towns shall also sit, debate, and vote by themselves in all public affairs during each session, and shall be called the house of representatives, and shall elect their own speaker and clerk for and during the continuance of such assembly: Provided, nevertheless, That when the senate and house of representatives shall see cause, or in such cases where it is directed by any law of this State, they may join in a grand committee and sit and vote together.

In the same volume, page 141, is "An act to establish a supreme judicial court in this State." The following is the first paragraph of section 2:

That the justices of the said supreme judicial court shall be appointed by the General Assembly in grand committee of both houses, at the general election in May—

Subject to removal "by a vote of the General Assembly."

In the same volume, page 146, is "An act establishing courts of common pleas in the several counties in this State," section 1 of which provides that there shall be in each county a court of common pleas, to consist of one chief justice and four other justices, "to be annually appointed by the General Assembly."

The Rhode Island constitution of 1842, the first constitution, provides, as appears by pages 1610 and 1611 of the Charters and Constitutions, for elections by the General Assembly in grand committee. So in Rhode Island for a period long anterior to the adoption of the constitution down to this hour all the business of the Legislature of Rhode Island in connection with elections has been done by a joint meeting of the two branches, called a joint committee.

By Trumbull's History of Connecticut (volume 1, page 100) it appears that Connecticut's first constitution was adopted January 14, 1639, which constituted a general assembly of one house. The three towns of Hartford, Windsor, and Weathersfield each sent four deputies, and a major part of these, with the governor and the major part of six magistrates, made the general assembly.

April 20, 1662, the province was organized under the charter of Charles II. At the October session of 1698 an act of the assembly provided that thereafter there should be two houses—the governor and magistrates to compose the upper house, the deputies to constitute the lower house; no law to be enacted or repealed except by the consent of both houses.

In the statutes of Connecticut (bound volume of 1796, page 124) there is "An act for constituting and regulating courts; appointing the times and places for holding the same." It provided for "two general courts or assemblies" each year, one at Hartford and the other at New Haven, the first to be called "the court of election," wherein there should be chosen one governor, one lieutenant-governor, twelve assistants or councilors, a treasurer, and a secretary for this State.

Section 3 proceeded as follows:

And the said general court shall be composed of two branches, the governor and council and the house of representatives, who shall convene in different apartments to transact the public business, and any act may be originated by either branch, but not be valid without the concurrence of both.

On page 154 is quoted "An act for regulating the election of Senators and Representatives for this State, in the Congress of the United States," section 1 of which provided for the filling of vacancies in the United States Senate by "the Legislature;" but there does not appear anywhere any enactment requiring the two branches, when engaged in the business of elections, to sit in one body or in grand committee. What the practice was I do not know.

Connecticut is the only State of the original thirteen where I have not been able to ascertain whether at the adoption of the Constitution the business of elections by the Legislature was conducted in joint assembly; but I have no doubt such was the practice, and it appears by the first constitution, that of 1798 (page 262 of Poore's Charters and Constitutions), that all officers the election of which the constitution devolved upon the Legislature were chosen by a joint ballot of both houses.

Now, I will ask the indulgence of the Senate to be allowed to insert in my remarks without reading them at this time the provisions of the constitutions of the remainder of the thirteen original States, all of which (except Pennsylvania and Georgia) had two houses of the Legislature at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and the like provisions in the constitutions of the States admitted since the adoption of the Constitution.

In New Jersey the constitution of 1776, page 1311, provided that "the council and assembly shall separately meet and that the consent of both houses shall be necessary to every law," but it is also provided, page 1312, that the council and assembly jointly shall by a majority of votes elect a governor. The judges of the courts and the other State officers shall be appointed by the council and assembly in the same manner. By the constitution of 1844, page 1318, in case there is a tie in the vote of the people for governor, one of the two highest "shall be chosen governor by a vote of the majority of both houses in joint meeting." Page 1322, "the judges of the courts of common pleas shall be appointed by the senate and general assembly in joint meeting;" and so of the State treasurer and the keeper and inspectors of the State prison.

"The senate and assembly were each to nominate as many persons as shall be equal to the whole number of delegates to be appointed, after which nomination they shall meet together, and those persons named in both lists shall be delegates, and out of those persons whose names are not on both lists, one-half shall be chosen by the joint ballot of the senators and members of assembly so met together as aforesaid." By the constitution of 1821, page 1343, in case of a tie on governor and lieutenant-governor, an election was to be made by the two houses of the Legislature on joint ballot. It was also provided as to secretary of of state and other State officers that if the senate and assembly should disagree the appointment should be made "by the joint ballot of the senators and members of assembly."

The constitution of Pennsylvania of 1776, page 1542, provided for only one branch of the Legislature, a house of representatives; but the constitution of 1790 provided, page 1550, that if two or more candidates for governor should be equal and highest in votes one should be chosen "by the joint vote of the members of both houses." The constitution of 1838, page 1559, provided that the votes of the people for governor should be opened publicly "in the presence of the members of both houses of the Legislature" and that a tie should be resolved "by the joint vote of the members of both houses."

The constitution of Delaware of 1776, page 274, provides that "A president or chief magistrate shall be chosen by joint ballot of both houses, to be taken in the house of assembly." "The General Assembly, by joint ballot, shall appoint the generals and field officers and all other officers in the Army and Navy of this State" (page 276). By the constitution of 1792, page 281, in the case of a tie on governor "the members of the two houses shall, by joint ballot, choose one of them to be governor." "Contested elections of a governor shall be determined by a joint committee."

The constitution of Maryland of 1776, page 824, provides for the election of a governor "by the joint ballot of both houses (to be taken in each house respectively) deposited in a conference room, the boxes to be examined by a joint committee of both houses, and the numbers severally reported that the appointment may be entered, which mode of taking the joint ballot of both houses shall be adopted in all cases."

The delegates in Congress "shall be chosen annually or superceded in the mean time by the joint ballot of both houses of assembly." By amendments to the constitution of 1876, page 835, a vacancy in the office of governor is to be filled by "the joint ballot of the two houses." A tie on governor is to be decided by the senate and house of delegates upon joint ballot, page 836. By the constitution of 1851, page 842, in case of tie or ineligibility the governor is to be elected "by a joint majority of the senate and house of delegates."

The Virginia constitution of 1776, page 1910, provides a method of electing a governor by joint ballot in the language of the Maryland provision. In the constitution of 1830, page 1917, the governor is to be elected by the joint vote of the two houses. The council of State is to be elected by joint vote of both houses; also the judges.

The North Carolina constitution of 1776, page 1412, provides: "The General Assembly shall by joint ballot of both houses appoint judges, etc." "The senate and house of commons jointly, at their first meeting, shall by ballot elect a governor, etc." "The senate and house of commons jointly, at their first meeting," "shall by ballot elect seven persons to be a council of State, etc." The General Assembly shall by joint ballot of both houses annually appoint a treasurer, by joint ballot of both houses triennially elect a secretary, page 1413. By the constitution of 1868, page 1425, in case of tie on governor, choice shall be made by joint ballot of both houses.

The South Carolina constitution of 1778, page 1621, provides that the senate and house of representatives shall, "jointly in the house of representatives, choose by ballot from among themselves, or from the people at large, a governor and commander-in-chief, a lieutenant-governor, etc." By the constitution of 1790, page 1631, a governor is to be chosen by the senate and house of representatives "jointly in the house of representatives." The judges and other State officers are to be elected "by the joint ballot of both houses in the house of representatives," page 1632.

By the constitution of Georgia of 1777, page 378, the house of assembly is made the only legislature. By the constitution of 1789, page 384, the General Assembly is divided into two houses. By the constitution of 1798, page 392, the General Assembly is to elect the governor. By the constitution of 1865, page 407, in case of a tie, the returns having been opened in the representative chamber, in the presence of the joint assembly, the governor is to be elected, a majority of the votes of the members present being necessary for a choice.

The provisions of the constitutions of the thirty-one States other than the thirteen original States relative to the performance of election functions by the Legislatures I will now exhibit by a reference to the pages of Poore's Charters and Constitutions, except as to the six recently admitted States, where the article and section is given. In all the thirty-one States there are express provisions for joint assemblies and joint ballots to break ties on the votes of the people for governor, or to choose officers whose election by the Legislatures is provided for, except in Kentucky and Minnesota, and in the latter a joint meeting for canvassing votes is provided for.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Senator from New Hampshire will suspend for a moment until the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, as the hour of 2 has arrived.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1549) providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair being of the opinion that the resolution of the Committee on Privileges and Elections is a question of privilege, and should be proceeded with until disposed of, will recognize the Senator from New Hampshire, temporarily laying aside the unfinished business.

Mr. MANDERSON. I simply desire to say that undoubtedly the ruling of the Chair is as it should be; this is a question of the highest privilege; but I hope that at the conclusion of the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire it may either be laid aside for further debate or a vote taken upon it, that we may proceed with the unfinished business, which I hope we may finish during the afternoon.

Mr. TELLER. I think we had better close this matter to-day; there will be no debate to speak of. There may be a few words said after the Senator from New Hampshire concludes, but there will be no extended debate, I understand. I think it is a question that ought to be disposed of to-day.

Mr. CHANDLER. If by the kind permission of the Senate I am allowed to insert the statistics which I have here, showing the provisions in the constitutions of all the forty-four States providing for joint ballot, I can make my remarks so short that I have no doubt the resolution can be voted upon without interfering with the bill which the Senator from Nebraska has in charge.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. COCKRELL. What is that request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That the statistics and references to the provisions of the constitutions of the forty-four States be printed as part of his remarks without his reading them. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, in view of the fact which I have shown to the Senate, that when the Constitution was adopted and the power was therein given to the Congress to absolutely regulate the election of United States Senators, except as to the place for electing Senators, there were in eleven of the thirteen original States provisions for joint assemblies for conducting what was termed the business of elections, as distinguished from the business of legislation; and in view of the further fact that every State which has been admitted into the Union since that time down to and including the six recent admissions has adopted this same method of dealing with elections by a joint assembly, I can not see how there can be a shadow of doubt raised as to the power of Congress by law to provide for the meeting of the members of a Legislature at a particular time and in a particular room to proceed with the election of a United States Senator, nor how there can be any doubt about the right of Congress, if it can pass such a law as that, constituting a joint assembly for this purpose and under these circumstances, to prescribe what shall be the quorum of the joint assembly. Congress can make the quorum as large as it pleases. It was argued by Senator SHERMAN in the debate in 1866 that Congress made it too large, and that a plurality ought to be allowed to elect. Congress can make the quorum as small as it pleases, and there can be no appeal from that decision of Congress. No State law can be of any avail against the law of Congress.

In this case there is no doubt about the meaning of the law

There is no doubt about the constitutional power to enact it, and it was, in my judgment, made precisely for this case, where 51 of the members of the Legislature of 100 had the right to proceed under the law to elect a United States Senator and to make a valid election. The law was constitutional in undertaking to define the quorum of the joint session. It defined that quorum to be a majority of the members of both houses, and the sitting member [Mr. Call] having been elected by a majority of both houses is lawfully entitled to his seat.

I wish, Mr. President, also to call attention to the authorities cited by the counsel for the contestant, Mr. Davidson, in his brief. There is an English case in Maule and Selwyn, and there is an American case in 23 Wendell, and there has been cited the case of Senator Harlan, from Iowa. Those two cases were in my judgment decided right according to the law as it then stood. The decision in the case of Senator Harlan of Iowa, in 1877, was made right according to the law as it then stood, but when in 1866 the statute was passed (the first exercise by Congress of this power, which had existed unexercised as to United States Senators from the adoption of the Constitution down to 1866) there was substituted a new rule of law for that which was applied by the English court and by the New York court and by the Senate of the United States in the case of Senator Harlan, and a new rule was provided for the election of Senators which was intended to put it out of the power of a bare majority of the smallest house of a State Legislature to prevent the election of a United States Senator provided there could be found to meet in a joint assembly a majority of the members elected to both houses.

Mr. GRAY. Before the Senator takes his seat I wish to ask him a question. I had not the pleasure of hearing the first part of his remarks and I do not know whether he alluded to the case of Mr. Stockton of New Jersey, whose case is said to have given rise to and to have been the occasion of the act of July, 1866. I ask him whether he knows in that case the objection made to the regularity of Mr. Stockton's election was that the joint assembly which assumed to choose him as Senator was not composed of a majority of both houses, and that upon that ground the Senate refused to give Mr. Stockton his seat. Does the Senator know whether that was the case or not?

Mr. TELLER. That was not the case.

Mr. GRAY. I was so informed by one of the Senators from New Jersey, now a member of this body.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator from Delaware that the case of Mr. Stockton was a case where there was an election by a plurality, and that was held first by the Senate to be a regular election, and subsequently by the Senate on reconsideration not to be regular. That did not raise the question, as I recollect it——

Mr. GRAY. Do I understand the Senator from Colorado to say that the question in the Stockton case was not whether the joint assembly could be constituted by less than a majority of all the members elected?

Mr. TELLER. No.

Mr. GRAY. But whether a plurality and not a majority of those constituting that assembly was sufficient to elect?

Mr. TELLER. I am very clear on that point.

Mr. CHANDLER. I may say that the joint meeting electing Mr. Stockton passed a resolution that the candidate receiving a plurality of the votes of members present should be declared duly elected; and on that ground, after much controversy, the Senator was not allowed to take his seat. But I have always understood, I will say to the Senator from Delaware, that that was one of the cases which led to the enactment of the law of 1866.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to state that Mr. Stockton took his seat, and on the first vote Mr. Stockton voted. The question was then raised whether, his seat being in controversy, he ought to vote, and on the second vote he failed to vote. Mr. Wright of Indiana, who was favoring Mr. Stockton's view of the case, was absent, and they lost his vote. Mr. Stockton was unseated by a bare majority, and out of that I think perhaps more than any other transaction grew the act of 1886.

Mr. CHANDLER. The vote was 20 to 22.

Mr. TELLER. I was not a member of the Senate at the time, but I sat in the gallery and heard the debate for several days, and I have a very distinct recollection of it. I have not referred to the record lately, but I remember the debate very well.

Mr. GRAY. I wish to ask the Senator from New Hampshire, before he dismisses this part of the subject, as he seems to have thoroughly examined it, what his opinion is in regard to the question propounded to him a moment ago by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART]. I did not distinctly understand what his answer to the question was, that question being, as I understood it, whether in case both houses of the Legislature failed to take any proceeding or action at all looking towards the election of a Senator the joint assembly, upon the day after the time fixed by the law of 1866 for the initiation of proceedings, could take jurisdiction and proceed to perform the duties that are imposed upon it by the act of Congress to which I have referred In other words, the act of Congress providing that on the second Tuesday after the organization of the Legislature there shall be a vote in each house separately to choose a United States Senator, and then upon the next day, which would be Wednesday, both houses shall meet in joint convention, whereupon the journals of each house shall be read, and if it shall appear—I am quoting from memory—that no person has received a majority of the votes in each house, or if either house has failed to vote, then the joint assembly shall proceed to choose a person to act as Senator, whether the language "if either house has failed" means to cover a case where both houses have failed, or whether we must confine it to the natural meaning of the word "either," one of two.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator having stated the law correctly, I am obliged to answer that according to that law, if either house has failed or both houses have failed to take proceedings on Tuesday, it is the duty of the Legislature to meet at 12 o'clock at noon where joint assemblies are usually held, and to proceed to the election of a United States Senator. I can not doubt that such is the meaning of the statute. It does not say if one house has failed and the other has not, but it says if either house has failed to take proceedings for the election of a Senator by concurrent vote then there shall be a joint assembly at noon on Wednesday.

Now, Mr. President, I do not undertake to say that we have a complete remedy where all the members of one branch of a Legislature refuse to perform their duty or where the whole Legislature refuse to perform their duty. There may be other legislation needed for such cases, but they have never yet happened, and are not likely to happen. What I have undertaken to do is to state my construction of the law as it stands, as applicable to this case, and to demonstrate and to affirm the full and unrestricted constitutional power of Congress over the whole subject of a joint assembly of a Legislature of a State which is bound to elect a United States Senator.

Mr. GRAY. It was very far from my purpose in rising to controvert any argument or statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire. On the contrary, I feel very much in his debt for the careful examination and exposition he has made of the many phases of this subject he has been treating of in the election of a United States Senator under the law that has been passed by Congress to regulate it, and I ask more for information than anything else, if he has considered that phase of it, whether there is any precedent he has discovered covering the case of a failure of both houses to take the initial proceedings upon the second Tuesday, in which a joint assembly has afterwards elected a United States Senator and it has been decided to have jurisdiction of the subject-matter?

Mr. CHANDLER. I have not discovered any such case. Of course it would require great research to investigate the proceedings of all the Senatorial elections of State Legislatures.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not desire to debate this subject, and I only rise because of the questions and suggestions of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY].

Up to 1866 there had been a difference of opinion in the different States as to the method of selecting Senators. The Senate had held in one instance that there must be a quorum of both houses, and in another instance that there need not be a quorum of both houses. It was held in one instance that when the General Assembly met a plurality could elect if the General Assembly so desired, and it was held in another case that a plurality could not elect.

The act of 1866 was then drawn for the express purpose, as will appear from the debates, of settling the law on this subject, it appearing from the constitutional provision that Congress had the entire control over the matter, save and except the location of the place where the Senatorial election should take place, and as a matter of course the election could only be by the Legislature.

I think the committee here have laid down the correct rule. It covers the whole ground:

> The two houses, as such, are given their day in court—are given, under a previous provision of the act, an opportunity to make the choice of Senator. After they have failed to make a choice, to hold that a quorum of each is necessary to make a joint assembly is to give them a chance to repeat this failure—it is to vitiate the very purpose of the enactment and to reinstate the evil which it was designed to remedy.

Now, this is the point I desire to call the attention of the Senator to.

> It was not the intention of the makers of the law of 1866 to place or leave it in the power of any minority of the whole number, or of a quorum, in either house, as such, to prevent or postpone the representation of the State in this body.

Mr. President, we have become so accustomed to treating a quorum in legislative bodies in this country as one more than half of the body that we lose sight of the fact that in very many of the States, or in some of them, at least, a quorum was two-thirds of the house. Under the old rule that two-thirds of the house was a quorum, a house might decline to go into joint session because there might not be a quorum present, yet there might be a majority of that body there, but not two-thirds. Thus the difference between the two-thirds and the majority, as we term it now, or the quorum as we would now treat it. So enough to break a quorum could by staying away prevent the two houses from acting, and both houses might fail to act.

I understand the law to be (and the precedents here, I think, will bear it out, and the Senate has always construed it that way) that the purpose of the act of 1866 was to see that at all times there was a Senator representing the State, if possible; and to take away the possibility of party zeal and party hate preventing the Legislature from electing because some could not elect the person that they desired. For instance, if one house were Democratic and the other Republican, it was almost certain under the old system that there would be no election until the next Legislature convened.

I understand this to be the broadest possible law to apply if the two houses fail. It is true it says if either house fails, but that must be construed as equivalent to saying if both houses fail, because you always construe a remedial statute of this kind in a liberal manner for the purpose of accomplishing the purpose for which it was avowedly enacted. If either house fails, or if both houses fail—and they are synonomous terms—if both houses fail on Tuesday (the act creates the General Assembly, and not the resolution of the houses), on the following day, Wednesday, the two houses are bound by law to meet; I mean the members of the Legislature not as houses, but the membership of the body.

If in this case in Florida there were 68 members of the house and 32 members of the senate, making 100 members when they were all there, and all the members of the senate staid away and the 68 members of the house assembled on the second day, that was a quorum of the whole body.

Mr. GRAY rose.

Mr. TELLER. Wait a moment. The house can elect just as well without the senate as with it if the senate stays away bodily, because if that were not so it would enable the senate, if all of one political party, to defeat the purpose of the law just as it would do if only a majority of it was of one political party. Now, if the Senator wants to ask me a question, I will yield.

Mr. GRAY. Yes, I did want to ask the Senator from Colorado a question just on that point. I have to say in all this matter I have no special interpretation of this law to enforce or to contend for. I am only seeking to elicit from the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as well as from his colleague, the Senator from New Hampshire, the result of their investigation. It is more for that than for any other purpose that I rise. But as the Senator from Colorado says that on Wednesday succeeding the Tuesday prescribed by the statute as the day upon which these proceedings for choosing a Senator shall be initiated the members of the Legislature come together in joint convention, not as separate houses but as individuals elected to one house or the other, I should like to call his attention to the fact that although that may be true in a sense, there is language used in the statute of 1866 which would seem to indicate that the separate existence of each house and its autonomy is recognized in the joint convention, because the language is that—

> At 12 o'clock meridan of the day following that on which proceedings are required to take place as aforesaid, the members of the two houses shall convene in joint assembly, and the journal of each house shall then be read.

It would seem that the reading of the journal of each house by some person or officer authorized by each house to so read it is a condition-precedent to the action of the joint assembly in proceeding to choose a Senator. Therefore, although the statute says that the members of each house shall assemble, it does seem that the separate existence of each house is required by the language of the act, and that unless the journals be read in the mode prescribed in the act, the joint convention would be without jurisdiction.

Mr. TELLER. If that were true then the very purpose for which the act was passed is defeated, that was to avoid the difficulty that we had met with in the election of Senators where one house would decline to go into the joint assembly because a majority of it could vote not to go into joint session. If a majority of each house must still go into joint session you have gained nothing by the act.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. TELLER. Wait a moment. Let me complete my sentence.

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will take the debates upon the act of 1866 he will find that the question was submitted to the Senate then, Must it be a quorum of each house? and they said, no, it must not be a quorum of each house; that they did not propose to continue the system that a quorum of each house was necessary to assemble. Now I will hear any question the Senator has to ask.

Mr. GRAY. I was merely going to say that it may be quite right, in the view of the Senator from Colorado, that the mischiefs intended to be remedied by the act would fail of remedy if the construction I suggest were true; but that is not the question. The act may be faulty in that respect. I only want to get the opinion of the Senator as to what the wording of the act requires.

Mr. TELLER. The wording of the act may be faulty. I do not think it is, but if it is faulty, there was a construction put upon the act before it was passed here, not binding, I will admit, upon the parties who subsequently construe it, but very persuasive, at least with this body, when the Senate comes to interpret and construe a statute that had been construed and interpreted on the floor of this body when it was passed.

Then, Mr. President, the Senate has at least eight or ten times declared that that was not the construction to be put upon the act. The cases are not cited in this report, but in various cases has the Senate passed upon the question and held that it was not necessary there should be a quorum of each house. That was one of the questions that had become, as I supposed, res adjudicata in this country, and I was never more suprised in my life than when I heard that it was contended in Florida that Mr. Call was not elected when he had in the joint convention a majority of the Legislature and that a majority of the members elected had voted for him. The contest there, as I understood it, was not upon the words of the statute, but upon the constitutionality of the statute, the governor contending that we had not any right to provide that less than a majority of each House should assemble in joint convention.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say a word or two about the statute of 1866, and only a word or two. If you keep steadily in view that the purpose of the statute was to compel the States to send their representatives here, then it must be construed in a way, unless it plainly means something else, to accomplish that purpose. All admit that that is a proper method of construing statutes. Before that time every Legislature had a right to elect on the day that was convenient to it, and it was done by passing usually a resolution to go into the election on a certain day, which was done some days before. We had the right to fix the time at which they should elect. We said, "You shall elect on the second Tuesday after the organization." Suppose on the second Tuesday after that organization there should have been armed forces in the possession of the State-house, as they have been in the possession of some State-houses in this country where this very question has arisen. Suppose that it was impossible for the members of the Legislature to assemble in their respective houses on the second Tuesday, does anybody deny that an assembly on the following day, without their having assembled on Tuesday, would have been a perfectly legal body, with power to elect a United States Senator? It is provided that "if either house fails," and, as I said before, keeping in view the purpose of the act, it must be construed that if both houses fail, because if both houses fail the evil is certainly greater than it is if one house fails; and if the act provided for the failure of one house it must be assumed that a failure of the two houses would come within the remedial provision that saves to the State the right to elect its Senator.

Suppose that still an armed force was in possession of the capital; that there was a revolutionary condition such as that the members of the Legislature dare not come out of hiding perhaps and dare not get together. These are extraordinary cases, and yet very nearly parallel to cases that have been presented to the Senate within fifteen years. Suppose that on the second day, on Wednesday, they could not meet, does anybody say that they could not meet on the following day, or ten days after? Will anybody say that the State had then lost its right to representation and that the Legislature had lost the power to elect? Mr. President, nobody will contend that. It was a continuing duty on their part to elect—not a privilege, but a duty to elect—and so each day when the opportunity was presented, when things were so that they could get together, it was their duty to meet and elect a Senator.

So I say that it is immaterial whether the two houses had voted or whether they had not voted; it is immaterial whether they went there with the speaker at their head or whether the speaker stayed away; the question is, did a majority of the members of the Legislature assemble at some time to exercise this privilege given them by the Constitution to elect a United States Senator? We must construe the statute in order that the States may be represented, so that if they had failed on the day prescribed they might proceed on the subsequent day. The statute is not prohibitory. It does not say they can not meet on any other day. It says, "You can not meet until that day; and then you can meet on any day if you can not meet on the day provided by law."

That, it seems to me, is what is absolutely necessary to carry out the purpose of the law, and it is necessary for more than that reason. It is necessary for the orderly and decent election of Senators to this body. I shall not characterize the appointment of Mr. Davidson; I shall not speak of that; but we have seen States heretofore almost in revolution over the election of Senators. The Congress of the United States, by the act of 1866, meant to make it plain just how a Legislature should elect and under what circumstances and conditions it should elect.

Mr. President, if you say, as has been suggested, that this is a legislative act, and that the two houses must be together (if it is a legislative act the two houses must concur by a majority of each house), then you have put the old question back in a worse condition than it was without the act. If the election of a Senator in the highest sense is a legislative act, which I deny, then there must be the concurrence of both houses. But it is not a legislative act any more than the selection of a governor is a legislative act when there is a failure to elect on the part of the people. It is a duty and a privilege given by the Constitution to the Legislature, and its members exercise it because they are members of the Legislature and not in the same way that they legislate upon statutes. That, I believe, is in perfect accordance with the sentiments of the Senate repeatedly declared by resolution in the admission of Senators within the last twenty-five years, or since the passage of the act of 1866.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the question is, what is the law? not what it ought to be. A great deal of feeling ought not to be excited in determining what the law is. We must find what the difficulty was, what the injury was that was intended to be remedied; what the situation was under which the law was passed.

For eighty years previous to the passage of the act of 1866 the whole matter had been left to the State Legislatures. They have the power in the first instance, Congress not interfering, to control the whole matter of electing Senators. It is entirely with them, but Congress may make regulations fixing the time and manner of electing. That is the full extent of the power of Congress. The question was very much discussed in the committee at the time the act was passed and for a long time before, whether Congress could give any remedy where either branch of the Legislature refused to act, on the ground that it was not a Legislature, and that the election of a Senator was a legislative act. But finally the evil became so great and there was so much confusion in electing Senators that it was seen necessary to pass an act, and although all felt the necessity many at the time doubted the constitutionality of the act.

The difficulty that had arisen (we want to look exactly at that), as the history of the country will show, was that one branch or the other of a Legislature would refuse to go into joint convention to elect a Senator so that the voice of the majority of the two houses could be ascertained in that election. No instance, I believe, ever occurred where both houses refused because the political party that could elect its Senator would have a majority of the convention when it met together. There would be a majority in the one house, but it would be a minority in the joint convention which would decline to go into the election. That arose in different cases. Two or three times it arose in California, and California remained unrepresented.

Now, bearing in mind that Congress did not intend to go further than was absolutely necessary to remedy the evils that resulted from one house or the other refusing, Congress having the power to fix the time fixed the second Tuesday after the organization as the time when each house should vote. It was agreed on all hands that that was fair, that it was legitimate. Then Congress provided that after having voted, the next day they should meet and the journals of the two houses should be read, and if from those journals it was ascertained that no one had a majority in both houses the joint assembly should go on and elect. If any one had a majority in both houses it would have been a legislative act; there is no about doubt that; but if no candidate had a majority vote in both houses, or if either house failed to choose, Congress provided that the joint assembly should have jurisdiction to go on and elect. But then the objection was that that would leave one house with a majority; that it would not be the legislative act of the two at that time. That was the objection (and it prevented the passage of a law for a long time), that you might thus elect a Senator without the consent of one of the houses. But after the subject had been well considered, Congress came to the conclusion to pass the act of 1866; and it has been sustained in practice and has worked well. But Congress provided that this joint assembly should take jurisdiction only after the reading of the journals of the two houses to see that it gets jurisdiction because one house or the other had failed to act; and that made the difficulty; and the act was passed to avoid that difficulty.

If it had been stated that if neither house had acted they should meet in joint convention, taking hold of the question in that way and taking it entirely away from the action of the two houses acting separately—if that had been suggested, the act could not have been passed. But it was worked down to the minimum to avoid the identical difficulty caused by one house refusing to go into joint convention to elect; and that was the only difficulty which had arisen. No one would have proposed at the time the act was passed to enact a law providing that the joint convention should be held without regard to the action of the separate houses. If it is to be done by a joint convention created directly by Congress, if you are going to remodel the action of the Legislatures to that extent, it is idle to talk about having any vote in either house the day previous; let them come together at once and elect.

But in all the argument and in all the investigation it was the aim to keep as near the present custom as possible, to go no further than was absolutely necessary in dealing with the question; and in all the dealings with the question it was said it only related to the time; that Congress could fix the time, and the manner of electing must be left to each house as a legislative body. The objection was that the act took away the power from one house, where a majority had not voted for a Senator, or had taken no action with reference to it. Now it is proposed to construe the law so that it will take away from both houses the power to initiate the proceedings. If you take the history of this legislation, and the discussions that occurred at the time, one could hardly give the act such a construction. If such a construction had been suggested at the time the bill was passed the act would never have become a law.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow, I will read from the remarks of Senator Trumbull:

> The public interest requires that each State should be represented in the Senate of the United States, and it may sometimes happen that the two branches of the Legislature are of different politics and then will not meet together to elect a Senator.

The object was to compel a joint meeting. I ask the Senator how, as he understands the law, it does compel a joint meeting? What remedy is there now if one of the houses refuses to go into a joint assembly?

Mr. STEWART. If one of the houses refuses to go into a joint assembly, and the other house wants to go in, then this act meets the exact difficulty. Either house voting for a Senator gives the joint assembly jurisdiction, but it does not have jurisdiction under the law until the event has happened. That is the point. So neither house can prevent it, but both houses meet. We can not control the Legislature. We can not, as the Senator from Colorado says, compel an election. We can not compel the Legislature to act. We can fix the times and places, and they may not vote at all. That is with the State.

All we can do is to fix the time and place of electing, but we can not make them vote. This is to meet the case where one house or the other fails to go into joint convention or fails to inaugurate the proceedings on the second Tuesday. It provides that if either house shall so fail they may still have jurisdiction to elect a Senator. So there is no danger with my construction of it of there ever being any failure, because always there will be one party or the other who will want an election, and one party must have a majority in one house in order to have a majority in the convention. There will be no difficulty, and the law met the exact trouble which had occurred. It was worded ex industria to meet that difficulty. Whether it will bear the other construction is a matter of consideration, and I have called attention to it because I think it a grave matter; and the view presented is so much in violation of the ideas that prevailed at the time the law was passed that I have felt called upon to direct attention to it.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I shall assume that this statute is constitutional, though I heard one of the best lawyers who ever sat in this body, now no longer a member, and who sat on the other side of the Chamber, say that he believed it was not constitutional. A question has been interjected this morning into this discussion which does not legitimately arise in the case before the Senate, but it is a very important question. I do not propose to go into the discussion fully now, but as some opinions are being expressed by Senators in whose judgment I have great confidence, and in which I can not concur, I believe it will be a proper discharge of my duty by saying this much, and at some other time if the question shall legitimately arise before the Senate I may speak further.

The question propounded by the Senator from Delaware, upon which the Senator from Colorado has expressed an opinion, raises a very important point in regard to the construction of the statute. I listened with great pleasure to the answer made by the Senator from Colorado; but it struck me, with due deference to my friend, that in making his argument, in his answer to the question propounded by the Senator from Delaware, he omitted one very important consideration. The question propounded by the Senator from Delaware, as I understood it, was this: The statute having declared that the two houses shall take a vote separately on the day named in the statute, and then, having also declared—I believe I will quote the language of the statute on that point:

If either house shall have failed to take proceedings as required by this act—

The question propounded by the Senator from Delaware was, if both houses fail, notwithstanding the omission of both houses to take a separate vote on the day fixed by law, whether the Legislature could meet at a subsequent time and without first having taken a separate vote in either house proceed at once in joint convention to make an election of Senator. I understood the Senator from Colorado to say that notwithstanding the provision of the statute, if there be a total omission on the part of both houses to have the separate vote, either on the day named or on some subsequent day, still the Legislature might meet in joint convention and vote for Senator.

The reason given by the Senator, I thought, while it was right in the main, failed to note one very important consideration. He said, and he said truly, that the duty of the Legislature to elect a Senator, if it failed to make the election on the day specified in the statute, was a continuing duty, a duty which remained on the Legislature until it was performed, for the very obvious reason stated by the Senator himself, that it was important that each State should have its representation in the United States Senate, and that therefore the omission of the Legislature to take the proper step or to hold the election on the day named could not be held to deprive the Legislature of the power at some subsequent day to perform the duty which they had neglected.

I agree with him entirely in that view, but here is where I think the Senator from Colorado mistakes in his argument. I admit that the duty is a continuing one, but how is that duty to be performed? Is it to be performed as the Legislature sees proper to discharge it, or is it to be performed as the statute requires them to perform it? I answer, most conclusively in the manner in which the statute requires them to do it. So, if there should be a total failure on the part of both houses to take the necessary steps to make an election on the day named in the statute, the continuing duty would remain on them to make that election afterwards, and when they came to make it afterwards they would be as much bound by every line and every syllable of the statute prescribing the mode and manner of making the election as if they had proceeded on the day named.

In a case of that sort, taking for example the supposition stated by the Senator from Colorado that there was a public enemy in possession of the state-house on the day named, so that the duty could not be performed, when the time comes that they could perform their duty, then what are they to do? Are they to disregard the written law, or are they to follow the prescribed rule in the statute just as if they had performed that duty or were performing that duty on the day named in the statute? So, in the case stated by the Senator from Colorado, I would say that when the Legislature had the opportunity to make an election, when the public enemy was expelled from the state-house, it was the duty of each separate house then and there to have its separate vote and elect a Senator in that way if they could agree, and, if they failed to agree, then to have a joint convention.

Now, one word, Mr. President, upon the meaning of the statute. It is not of doubtful meaning. If language can be made to express the idea clearly, it is expressed clearly in this statute. Let us see whether that is true. After prescribing that the Legislature shall, on the Tuesday named, take a separate vote in each house for Senator, that being the first and primary method by which the election is to be made, it proceeds:

At 12 o'clock meridian of the day following that on which proceedings are required—

Are required, the very strongest language which can be used—are required to take place, as aforesaid—

Not merely directed, but required—

the members of the two houses shall convene in joint assembly, and the journal of each house shall then be read, and if the same person shall have received a majority of all the votes in each house, such person shall be declared duly elected Senator.

In that case it will be perceived that the election is made by the separate action of each house, and that the duty of the joint convention has nothing in the world to do with an election. Their duty is simply to ascertain by the reading of the journals of the two houses whether an election as prescribed by law has taken place, and if it has taken place then to declare the result. Now, so far there can be no difficulty about this statute. It proceeds:

But if the same person shall not have received a majority of the votes in each house.

That is one contingency on which the joint convention may meet, that the vote was taken in each house separately and that there was a failure in one of the houses, or that there was a failure as to the same person receiving a majority of both houses. If he received a majority in each he was elected; if he failed to receive a majority in each, then he was not elected. That is one of the conditions precedent upon which there is authority given in the statute for the holding of a joint convention for electoral purposes.

I admit, as I stated some time ago, there is to be a joint convention at all events; but in a case where the same person receives a majority in both houses it is not an electoral body; it is simply a body to ascertain and declare the result of an election which has already been had.

Now, let me proceed:

But if the same person shall not have received a majority of the votes in each house, or if either house shall have failed to take proceedings as required by this act, the joint assembly shall then proceed.

What does that mean?

If either house shall have failed.

The Senator from Colorado says that means if either or both houses have failed; but that is not the language of the statute. What is the meaning of the word "either"? There is no dispute about that. If you go to a dictionary you will find it means "one of two," and therefore, in reading this statute, we have a right to substitute the proper legal, etymological meaning of the word "either" for the word itself. Then it would read in this way: "or if one of the two houses shall have failed."

Mr. President, if it had read that way, would any man say that that meant the same thing as if "both of the two houses" had been written in the statute?

Mr. TELLER. I would not say so if it was written in that way; but it is not written in that way.

Mr. GEORGE. I know it is not. But in construing statutes, constitutions, and written instruments there is no legal legerdemain by which you may read the language of the instrument, and when you come to construe it you may give that language a meaning that it is not entitled to. It is always the safest test of the meaning of a written instrument, when a word is used which has a recognized, settled meaning, in grammar or law, that you may substitute the meaning for the word itself. We are not playing upon words in the construction of a statute. We are dealing with ideas. The words represent ideas, and if "either" means etymologically and in law "one of two," you can not in construing this statute say that it means "both of two." There can be no answer to that.

If either house shall have failed to take proceedings as required by this act, the joint assembly shall then—

"Then" here means not only time but the event upon which they shall proceed. But if gentlemen say that "either," if the other words of the statute require it, may have a different meaning from that which is its ordinary and grammatical meaning, I answer, first, that is true, it may have. But before you can discard its grammatical meaning, one of two things must occur: first, that the context of the statute, the other parts of the statute, evidently require a different meaning to be attached to the word. Senators, when they come to consider this, will find it impossible to discern in the context any provision which requires that the word "either" shall be construed as "either or both." The next ground for such a liberal construction as is contended for is a very dangerous ground, one upon which courts tread with great care and caution, but still, in a plain case, where the mischief which the statute was intended to remedy requires, in order to effectuate the remedy which the statute prescribes, a different meaning to be prescribed, then the courts will in a case of that sort give a word a different meaning.

Now, let us see whether anything of that sort did occur in this statute. If you will read the debates, as I have read them, you will find that Mr. Fessenden of Maine and other Senators, in arguing upon this statute at the time it was passed, made the complaint (and on that point it was the sole complaint) that when there was a difference between the two houses, one of them was in the habit of not concurring in an election, and Mr. Fessenden, I believe, stated in his remarks that he had been voted for and got a majority eighteen times in one house, and the other house refused to join in performing the act of election. It is thus found that one of the great mischiefs, if not the great and overpowering mischief, which required or which caused the enactment of this statute, was this: to provide that an election should take place notwithstanding the default of one house or the other. No suggestion was made in the argument on the passage of the bill, as no suggestion can be made here, that there was any mischief arising out of the fact that both houses had declined to perform their duty. It was only as to one house. That was the great leading fundamental idea, the great mischief which was to be remedied by the statute—the default of one house.

Mr. GRAY. There could be no remedy for the default of both.

Mr. GEORGE. No, there could not; but only for the default of one. Did the statute use the proper language to carry out that idea? Let us see:

Or if either house shall have failed.

Coming exactly in grammatical and legal language to fit the very mischief for which the statute was passed, and yet it is said that we may make a contingency, make a condition precedent to the calling of the joint assembly, the failure of both houses instead of the failure of one.

Mr. President, that can not be done without doing that injury to the English language which, if it were justifiable, would make it an unfit instrument in which laws should be enacted and propounded to the people. We are bound to follow the language in its ordinary signification. Why? That is not a mere technical rule of commentators and of courts, but it arises from the absolute duty of the lawmaking power to express the ideas intended to be conveyed in a statute in language that the people can understand, for the people are bound by it.

Now, sir, if the Senator from Colorado is right in the supposition that the statute authorizes the meeting of the joint convention in a case where both houses have failed to take separate proceedings, you interject into this statute an idea not only not expressed in it, but absolutely and peremptorily rejected by it, and not within any mischief intended to be remedied by it.

I have spoken now longer than I intended, but it is an interesting question and may become a practical question in the proceedings of the Senate. One word more as to the meaning of the statute.

It will be seen that when the statute comes to speak of elections by the separate houses, it recognizes a very great doctrine of State rights; that is, that the quorum of each house in holding its separate election is to be determined by the law or the constitution of the State for which the Legislature acts. There is no attempt in the statute, when you come to hold this separate election in each house, to say how many of each house shall be present; and I undertake to say that, if the constitution of the State allowed, as the English constitution does as to the House of Commons, a number less than a majority to constitute a quorum, in the separate election held under this statute, that number would be sufficient. There is nothing said about it, as Congress could not, when it took the Legislature in its separate branches and as a constitutional State organism, do otherwise than make a provision in reference to it such as is in the constitution of the State. At all events, they did not intend to do it, and so a constitution may be like, as I understand the constitution of Indiana is—and if I am mistaken in that my friend from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] can correct me—they require three-fifths of the members to make a quorum. Is that so?

Mr. TURPIE. That was the case at one time, but only a majority is required now.

Mr. GEORGE. At one time it was three-fifths; now it is only a majority, I am informed by my friend. Suppose the constitution of a State, like the former constitution of Indiana, required three-fifths of the members to be present in order to constitute a house, then no proceedings could be had under this statute, unless there were three-fifths of the members present to constitute a quorum; but now, notice, that whilst not a word is said about how many shall constitute a quorum when the vote is taken in the separate houses, leaving that to the constitution of the State in which the Legislature is organized, as soon as we depart from that and provide for the joint meeting of the Legislature, then we have a provision as to the quorum, and that provision has been settled rightly, I think, in the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

So you see, Mr. President, that the scheme of this statute was and is, first, to adopt the State machinery without a single suggestion as to the constitution of that machinery, leaving it exclusively to the State constitution to adopt that machinery thus organized according to State law and State constitution as the first and primary method of election, and that only when that failed was the Congressional resorted to. The statute could have said, as some of the States provided in their laws at one time, that no election shall be had unless the person elected receives a majority of each branch of the Legislature. It could have done that under the plenary power given in the Constitution to prescribe the manner; but Congress did not do that. They adopted that as the primary method in which the election should be held, leaving it to the State, leaving it to State law, leaving it to State constitution, as to the number required to participate in the proceedings.

If that election thus conducted should result, as according to all State constitutions it was necessary to result, in order to pass a law, in the concurring of each branch in the selection of the same person, then the election was performed, it was done. As I remarked before, the holding of the joint convention had nothing to do with the election, except to ascertain what had been the result of an election the day previous in the separate houses. That they could only ascertain in one way, by the reading of the journal of each house, and it appearing from the journals that one man had received a majority in each house they made the declaration of that, and that ended it. It ended the joint convention.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator from Mississippi a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I do.

Mr. MITCHELL. Recurring to the point made a few moments ago by the Senator, I understood him to argue that in the event that both houses failed to vote separately on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization of the Legislature, in that case the condition of the law was not met that would enable the joint assembly to proceed on the next day and elect a Senator. Was that the argument?

Mr. GEORGE. Are you through?

Mr. MITCHELL. No. Now, I should like to know from the Senator what his opinion is as to the real purpose of the law in providing that the two houses shall vote separately on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization of the Legislature before there can be a joint assembly? What was the evil to be avoided? What was the object of that provision of the law? That is the question that I should like to have answered.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I stated very distinctly that in case of a failure of both houses then the continuing duty spoken of by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] rested upon the Legislature to make the election, and it rested exactly, according to the terms of the statute, in the same words and to the same extent as it rested in the first instance. Time may be, and I think is, an essential element in the election to the extent that you can not have it before the time prescribed by the statute, but then, for the overpowering considerations mentioned by the Senator from Colorado, when the time elapses and the duty has not been performed, then the duty remains, and the question is how does that duty remain to be performed? Did the default of the Legislature, whether accidental, necessary, or willful, in not holding the separate election on the day prescribed by the statute—note it—change the provision of the statute as to that event?

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I asked him what I thought was a plain question.

Mr. GEORGE. And I tried to answer it. I did not get quite through with the answer.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not consider that the Senator has answered the question at all. Now I will state what I believe, if the Senator will allow me, was the purpose of that provision.

Mr. GEORGE. I object to that. I object to having the errors of the Senator from Oregon injected into my speech.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then, will the Senator please answer my question what the purpose of Congress was, in the act regulating the election of United States Senators, in providing that the two houses should meet separately on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization before there should be a joint assembly? What was the purpose of that?

Mr. GEORGE. Is that the question?

Mr. MITCHELL. I have got a very clear idea in my own mind as to what the purpose was.

Mr. GEORGE. So have I.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to hear what the Senator's idea is.

Mr. GEORGE. I will tell what the purpose was. If there is anything in the English language, the purpose was that there should be a separate election in each house.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was it not the purpose that each house should have an opportunity to elect a Senator as a Legislature? Was not that the only object?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not know anything about any option given by the statute. There are no options here given to either house to do or not to do. The language is mandatory. I want to call the attention of the Senator to this again, and if he had listened to me all the way through he would not have needed to be reminded now by my reading the statute. On the question of options, opportunities given, let us see how that goes.

Or if either house shall have failed to take proceedings—

It is a very good way to put the idea which you get from the statute into words, and not to twist or torture the words. If the Senator from Oregon was right, the statute would read this way:

If either house has failed to take the proceedings, as they are allowed to do in their option, then—

But the language of the statute is not that. I will read it for the benefit of my friend from Oregon. This is the language:

If either house shall have failed to take proceedings as required—

What does "required" mean? Does it mean in legal language a mere option given to a party to do or not to do a certain thing as he sees proper? The word is "required"——

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator put the word "option" in my mouth, which I never uttered, nor did I ever utter any word which means that.

Mr. GEORGE. "Opportunity," then. That is, that which they may take or not. That is option.

Mr. MITCHELL. No option at all.

Mr. GEORGE. I will put it your way, then.

Mr. MITCHELL. I say the real purpose of the provision was to give an opportunity—you can call it "required"—to the Legislature to elect, each house in its official legislative capacity voting as such. That being so, if I am right about that——

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think you are right. I think you are wrong.

Mr. MITCHELL. Suppose I am right. Then——

Mr. GEORGE. Suppose the whole statute is wiped out.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would follow it up by the conclusion that that word "either" should be construed to mean, just as it does mean, one or the other, one or a great many, or to include both.

Mr. GEORGE. It means "one of two."

Mr. MITCHELL. It includes both.

Mr. GEORGE. If I have got two horses out in front here, and I tell my friend to go and take either of them, does he think he would have a right to take both? [Laughter.]

Mr. MITCHELL. If they belonged to the Senator from Mississippi, I would not take either. [Laughter.]

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator will please keep quiet now. I will show him that his position is so absurd that he will think so himself. I should like to see my friend, in a case of that sort, riding off on both horses.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would not take either if they belonged to the Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. Now, Mr. President, the Senator objects to the word "option." One of the greatest troubles in human reasoning—I believe my Lord Bacon says something about that, and, if he does not, I know that about as great a man as he, John Locke, wrote a whole chapter in his book on the Human Understanding on that subject—is taking a word as mere sound without attaching to it any definite and determinate meaning. The Senator objects to my use of the word "option," and yet it necessarily meant in his argument that the Legislature had the option to take advantage of the opportunity or not, because he says the statute only means to give to them an opportunity, and, if they do not take advantage of the opportunity, it is just the same thing as if they did, and in the judgment of Congress, as suggested by my friend from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], it does not make any difference here.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator means if one house has the opportunity the other has not.

Mr. GEORGE. I mean the language of the statute. I do not think either of them has any option about it. I think, in the language of the statute and in the very clause under consideration, both are required. How required? Are they at liberty to do or not to do as each sees proper, or are they bound by their oaths to discharge the duties incumbent upon them according to the law and the Constitution? Were they bound and required to take the vote?

When we look at this statute in its plain language, there is not a single place for an ambiguity. When we look at the language construed according to its plain meaning, we find that that language is appropriate to meet the very evil to remedy which the statute was passed. That is, as I have stated before in this argument, the whole ground upon which the statute was passed and enacted by the vote of both parties was to prevent the failure of an election of United States Senators by the Legislature through the neglect of either branch of the Legislature.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me right there, as this is a very interesting point?

Mr. GEORGE. Very.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would the Senator from Mississippi hold, in the event that both houses failed to vote on the second Tuesday after the meeting and organization of the Legislature, that then there could be no election of Senator? Is that the ground?

Mr. GEORGE Is that the question?

Mr. MITCHELL. It is.

Mr. GEORGE. My Lord, Mr. President, how deep the Senator from Oregon is! [Laughter].

Mr. MITCHELL. Not very, not near as deep as the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. GEORGE. Has he paid any attention to the humble remarks which I have made?

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not hear them all.

Mr. GEORGE. I said expressly, in commenting upon what was said by the learned Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], that the duty to act in accordance with the statute was a continuing duty.

Mr. MITCHELL. Continuing how—to both houses, or to each separately?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir; first in the separate houses, continuing all the way through. Now let us stop. Here is a point to which there can be no answer. The statute is mandatory. It requires a separate vote in each house.

Mr. MITCHELL. Why is it on a certain day, the second Tuesday after organizing?

Mr. GEORGE. Never mind about that. We will read about that continuing duty. I will refer the Senator to the argument of the Senator from Colorado on that point.

Now, sir, can the Legislature, sworn to act in this election matter according to law, refuse in performing this continuing duty, which the Senator from Oregon as well as myself and all of us agree—and I have heard nobody dispute it—can they in the performance of this duty exempt themselves from the plain provision of the statute? Or, in other words, if they do their duty as the law prescribes it, they must take the separate votes. If they fail to do their duty as the law requires on that day, then, in discharging this continuing duty, which we all agree rests upon the Legislature, can they perform it by omitting to perform the primary duty fixed by the statute, which they should have performed as a necessary condition precedent to the meeting in joint convention?

Mr. President, I do not know that one violation of law—I hope the Senator from Oregon will note what I say—one contemptuous disregard of the provisions of the law, authorizes the Legislature to go on and make another. That, sir, is plain. A Legislature can not hold a joint convention until it has first, according to the statute, voted separately, but—I hope the Senator from Oregon as well as my friend from Colorado will note what I say now—in order to carry out the manifest purpose for which the statute was enacted, to prevent the failure of an election by the fault of one house of a Legislature, Congress has provided if one failed and the other acted, nevertheless they shall meet in joint convention.

What right have we to say, when this statute prescribes the default of one only as the condition-precedent for the meeting of the joint convention, that the default of both can do this, when that means a permission by the statute for the Legislature to repeal in its action that part of it which requires the separate vote? How will you get around that? I want to make this very plain. I did not intend to speak so long, but my friend from Oregon came in with his sharp points on me, and I have been betrayed into a longer debate upon this subject than I intended.

Now, Mr. President, one more argument, because I want to make this thing so plain that no man need mistake about it.

But if the same person shall not have received a majority of the votes in each house * * * the joint assembly shall then proceed to choose—

Suppose the statute read that way. Then there would have been no doubt but that the separate election in each house was a necessary condition-precedent to the holding of a joint convention. But Congress did not desire to leave it in that fix. What did they do? They inserted that which they were willing to constitute in law a valid excuse for the failure to hold the separate election in each House, and that valid excuse is in the language which now, for the third time, I read to the Senate, for, after all, the plain meaning of the words of a statute is the best commentary upon its construction.

Or if either House shall have failed to take proceedings as required by this act—the joint assembly shall proceed to choose.

Then—

I have been—I was going to say betrayed, but that may not be courteous, and I will say beguiled by my friend from Oregon into making a longer speech on this subject than I intended to have made—but I want to call the attention of my friend from Oregon and my friend from Colorado and of all the Senators here to the plain, unambiguous, unequivocal meaning of the statute, and I submit that we have no right, following after some fatuous theory in regard to the purpose and intent of the statute, otherwise than that purpose and intent is disclosed in the words of the statute itself, going off after something of that sort to dig out of the statute—yes, sir, dig out of it, and erase from it one of the plain provisions made therein as a condition precedent to the holding of the joint convention.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, as I think my friend from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] probably does not expect to get through with his printing bill to-night, I shall now take an opportunity to express my opinion upon the statute of 1866, which

I think is much clearer than my friend from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] believes it to be.

If we look at the intent and the object of this statute, it will be perfectly plain that the design of Congress was to avoid the difficulty that had occurred ever since the foundation of the Government in regard to the election of Senators. Before the passage of the statute of 1866 it was very often the case that a State was without a representative in the Senate, and in many cases with but one Senator, growing out of a difference between the two houses of a Legislature in the election of a Senator. I know in the State of Ohio, one house being Democratic and the other Whig in the olden times, we were very often with but one Senator. That got to be so great an evil that during and after the war there were a good many controversies about it. Finally Congress, under the powers granted by the Constitution, undertook to avoid that evil and provide a way in which the Legislature of each State should be compelled to elect a Senator and thus avoid the want of representation in this body.

The language is very clear, and however construed, whether grammatically or with a view to accomplish the object of the statute, it seems to me these words make it very plain. They have been read by the Senator from Mississippi, and have been read by all:

But if the same person shall not have received a majority of the votes in each house, or if either house shall have failed to take proceedings as required by this act, the joint assembly shall then proceed to choose.

Now, my friend from Mississippi goes upon the idea that the word "either" is necessarily in the singular number; but, on the contrary, both by the grammar and by the dictionary, and in the ordinary use of language, the word "either" applies to every one of the other alternatives that may be suggested. It is plural, and it may be construed grammatically either in the plural or in the singular. So the word "either" often means "both," and is constantly used in that way in our ordinary language.

In the particular case which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] put to my friend from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], where a man was authorized to take either one of two horses, there the word "either," I suppose, would have a singular application and be in the singular number; but now let me look at the dictionary and see what is said there, and I take the highest standard that is now known, I suppose, in the English language, and that is the Century Dictionary. Here it is very specifically defined that the word "either" may be used either in the singular or plural number, most generally in the plural, and when we say "either of that block of houses" it includes every one of the block, although only one may be designated. Then, look at the dictionary itself. Here the word "either"—and a good deal of space is given to its meanings, because it has many meanings—

1. In one case; according to one choice or supposition (in a series of two or more); a disjunctive conjunction, preceding one of a series of two or more alternative clauses, etc.

That is a very common way to use it, applied to a particular thing among many; but here is the more general use:

2. In any case—

So that the word "either" means "in any case" and if, therefore, in this language, instead of the word "either," the words "in any case" had been used, that is, in case of a failure of the two houses to elect a Senator on the Tuesday fixed by law, then, in that event, the joint convention should be held. That is plainly and manifestly the grammatical construction of the sentence—"either of the two houses," that is, either the house of representatives in one contingency or the senate in the other contingency. It includes both, and the word "either" applies to one house as well as to the other. Therefore, it seems to me, that the words "both" and "either" in this language would be construed as precisely the same, and here in the cases put are many poetical quotations cited in the Century Dictionary. I will read it all:

In any case;—

That is one definition for the word "either"— at all: used adverbially, for emphasis, after a sentence expressing a negation of one or two alternatives or of all alternatives; corresponding to two similarly used after affirmative sentences; as, he tried it, and didn't succeed; then I tried it, but I didn't succeed either. That's mine; no, it isn't, either.

So that the word "either" is used both in the plural and in the singular.

Now, when you come to look at the object of this law, what is it? It is to secure absolutely the election of a Senator. Then it is provided that each house shall vote separately, and if each house casts a majority vote for the same person, that person is elected, and nothing more is done, that is the end of the election on Tuesday, each house concurring separately in the election of one person. That is the common way. If that plan fails in electing a Senator, then the two houses, or the members of the two houses, have conjointly in joint session to meet and elect.

It seems to me that if we give to the meaning of the word "either" that which is attached to it by my friend from Mississippi, the same evil that we had in olden times would be revived and reëxist; for instance, in the ordinary case where one house is Republican and the other house is Democratic, suppose that upon a joint vote the majority should be Democratic. Then the Republican house might refuse to hold an election, might refuse to go into joint convention, and might defeat the object of the law. Thus the whole purpose of this statute, which has been so beneficial in the history of our Government, would be defeated.

I say that such a construction ought to be given to a law as will carry out its object. I do not know how it operates in this particular case; it does not operate at all, as I understand, and therefore it is mere theory. But it seems to me perfectly clear that that is the fair construction of the law, with a view to carry it into effect.

I find that in the debate in 1866, when this subject was pending, I took the ground that the vote by separate houses ought not to occur, and I sought to avoid it, but it was thought better to follow the ordinary form of an election. I insisted that this separate vote by the separate houses did not accomplish anything, and probably would tend to defeat the law, on the ground that the members would disclose their wishes, and probably that would lead to a defeat and a failure to elect on the refusal of one or the other of the houses.

It was thought best, however, to have a preliminary trial of an election in the ordinary way by the two houses as separate branches of the Legislature, and after that and in case the first effort failed on Tuesday, then there was to be a joint election. There never could be but one opportunity to elect by a separate vote of the two houses, because that must occur on a particular day, Tuesday. If, for any reason whatever, the refusal of either house to perform this duty on that day or the presence of violence mentioned by the Senator from Colorado, the duty is not performed on that day, the only day when the two houses could possibly vote separately, if they fail to have an election, the other expedient is resorted to; and that is continued from day to day until a final result is had, and with a single body it was certain that a result would come at some time or another, unless the candidates were so numerous and the votes so scattered that a majority could not be concentrated upon one. So the first day's attempt on Tuesday, in the ordinary vote by the two houses, was a mere trial, a mere effort, and if the concentration of both houses happened to be upon one candidate, he was elected, but if not, then they must go into joint convention and work out the problem the best way they can, the only requisite being that a majority finally shall concur in the election of some one person.

I think that is the fair construction of this statute. We can now look at it with absolute indifference, and yet the vote to-day may be very important hereafter. If the vote of the Senate now should be that the word "either" is to be construed in the singular number, applicable only to one and not to both, in my judgment it would lay the foundation of many disputes hereafter, and would probably cause conflicts in the Senate that should not occur. I think the construction that has been given to this law since its formation has been the one that I now give, that the first vote was to be rather an experimental vote to test the sense of the respective houses.

The joint convention must meet on Wednesday at all events, because even if the two houses agree and there is no opposition to the candidate, they must meet together to declare the result, and if the result is that an election has been made on Tuesday, well and good; if not, then the real operative section of this law comes into play, by which, in my judgment, many, many—I do not know how many—disputes over Senatorial elections have been avoided, and a rule has been established which nobody yet has had the courage to try to repeal or avoid. But the construction that is proposed to be given to the word "either" would, in my judgment, open the door to dispute and compel new legislation to avoid this construction in order to maintain the object of Congress in trying to secure prompt elections of Senators of the United States.

Although my friend's reasoning is very ingenious and very plausible, yet the word "either" has a good deal broader meaning than he has given to it, and I think, if he will apply it as it is applied in the dictionary, or as it is intended to be applied in the law, he will change his opinion. At all events, the indorsement of his opinion will create a great many disputes and troubles in the Senate to those who come after us.

I therefore insist upon it that the law as it now stands is clear enough; that the word "either" means that if either or both—because it means both in many cases where it is used—if either or both, or for any cause the two houses do not agree and fail to elect a Senator by the separate vote of each house, then the joint convention meets, and if both houses have neglected to perform that duty, or if either house has neglected to perform its duty, I can see a reason why the law would not provide for both very clearly, because there would be no object of both houses refusing to vote if they were both agreed in opinion.

There would be nothing to remedy, as is suggested to me, and therefore the case would not probably occur where both houses would refuse because one house or the other knew where the majority of the joint convention lay, and neither house, certain to be supported on the next day by the joint body, would stay away from the performance of their duty. Therefore the word "either" might necessarily be held to include "both," because "either" meant either the house or the senate, and the two probably never would, and the case could never arise, except in a revolution or under violence, where the two houses would refuse to perform their duty.

Mr. GEORGE and Mr. GRAY addressed the Chair.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator from Mississippi will allow me——

Mr. GEORGE. I just want to read from Webster.

Mr. GRAY. While the Senator from Ohio is fresh from the dictionary from which he quoted, the Century Dictionary, I should like to call his attention——

Mr. GEORGE. I wanted to read from Webster's Dictionary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is entitled to the floor, as he first addressed the Chair.

Mr. GRAY. I beg pardon. I thought I was recognized.

Mr. GEORGE. I am a very short horse and will soon be curried. I merely want to read from Webster's Dictionary.

Mr. GRAY. I want to read from the Century Dictionary.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know anything about the Century Dictionary.

Mr. GRAY. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] read from it.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me get through, and then you can go on.

Mr. GRAY. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. I am very glad to find that Webster says that "either" means "one or the other of two." That is the first primary meaning.

1. One or the other of two; any one of an indeterminate number.

That is the first definition.

2. Each.

Everybody knows the difference between "either" and "each."

Each signifies both of them.

"Each" is a shorter word than "either," and Congress by striking out the words "either house" and making an insertion could have said "each house" and would have saved two or three letters by it.

"Each" signifies both of them, taken distinctly or separately; "either" properly signifies only the one or the other of them, taken disjunctively.

Now I surrender the floor to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. I merely wanted to call the attention of the Senator fro m Ohio to the very respectable authority which he quoted, the Century Dictionary, and to say to him that I think that inadvertently his eye escaped the "either" which is an adjective pronoun, and fell upon the word "either" which is a conjunction. He read from the definition of the word "either" as a conjunction.

In one case; according to one choice or supposition.

And the examples given are, for instance:

> Nay, 'tis no matter, either for himself
> Or for the affection of his colours.

Usually followed by the conjunction "or," "either one thing or another."

In that case it is a conjunction, and is not the word that is used in the statute, which is an adjective pronoun, the meaning of which was quoted by the Senator from Mississippi from a dictionary before him, and is substantially the same as that in the Century: "One or the other, one of two taken indifferently." There is a difference between the pronoun and the conjunction.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think perhaps in justice to the Senator from Florida—the sitting member—before the vote is taken it would be well to recall attention to the fact that no one of these questions which have been discussed for the last half hour arises in his case. We are dealing with a case where a joint convention regularly met and voted for thirty days, and at the end of that time, without any action in either house, seventeen members of the senate undertook to destroy that joint assembly by absenting themselves, and the question is whether they can do that. We are all agreed, including the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], who is a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that the joint assembly in this case could not be destroyed in that way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. GEORGE. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the Hon. Wilkinson Call, of Florida, was duly elected by the Legisature of the said State on the 26th day of May, 1891, a Senator of the United States from said State for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1891, and that he is lawfully entitled to a seat in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the resolution reported by the committee; which has been read.

The resolution was agreed to.

ARTESIAN AND UNDERFLOW INVESTIGATION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following communication from the Secretary of Agriculture; which was read:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 4, 1892.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith the final report of the artesian and underflow investigation, and of the irrigation inquiry, as conducted under my direction, in pursuance of authority conferred by act of Congress approved April 4, 1890, and an act approved September 30, 1890, and an act approved March 3, 1891, and to state that it was fully completed and deposited in accordance with the terms and conditions of the last-mentioned act. I have the honor to remain,

Yours, respectfully,

J. M. RUSK, Secretary.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

Mr. MANDERSON. While I realize that that letter accompanies a report of very great importance, the great magnitude of the papers reaching, I should think, to a quarter of a ton in weight, as I estimate it, would prompt that we refer to the Committee on Printing the question as to whether the usual number of copies should be printed. The subject is a matter of irrigation, and I presume it concerns the whole subject of the irrigation of arid lands.

Mr. SANDERS. Is it on the subject of arid lands?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, I think that is included. I therefore move that the letter of the Secretary of Agriculture be printed in the RECORD, as it will be, having been read, but that the accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Printing, without printing.

Mr. COCKRELL. Together with the letter, although it is printed, because if the Committee on Printing report it back and order it to be printed, we want the letter of the Secretary printed with it.

Mr. MANDERSON. Of course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska moves that the communication of the Secretary of Agriculture, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Printing. If there be no objection, that motion will be considered as agreed to. The Chair hears no objection.

SENATOR FROM IDAHO.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] if the views of the minority have been submitted yet in the contested case from Idaho? We have agreed to adjourn over from to-day until Monday, and I am very anxious to have the report of the committee printed.

Mr. GRAY. The senior member of the minority, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE], has had the preparation of that report and has the papers, but I have not seen him in the Senate since the Senator last spoke to me about it. Therefore I can not answer; but from what I understood from him, he said he was about ready. I take it if he may be allowed to anticipate the meeting of the Senate, as we are to adjourn over until Monday, by putting it in the hands of the Printer or in the hands of the Secretary of the Senate to-morrow——

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not think there can by any objection to that.

Mr. GRAY. If that can be done without objection, I think there will be no trouble about it.

Mr. COCKRELL. An order might be made that the Senator from North Carolina have leave to hand in the report and have it printed, as has often been done.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then I ask that the report of the committee submitted some three days since be ordered printed with the understanding that the minority may submit their views.

Mr. COCKRELL. So that they may be printed together.

Mr. MITCHELL. So that they may be printed together.

Mr. GRAY. Through the Secretary of the Senate?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, that can be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection that order will be made.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE HOUK.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to give notice that I shall on Tuesday next at 3 o'clock ask the Senate to consider the House resolutions in respect to the death of the Hon. Leonidas C. Houk, late a Representative from the Second district of Tennessee.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I should be very glad to proceed until such an hour as the Senate may deem best to adjourn with the bill which has been under consideration and which is the unfinished business. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will withhold his motion for an executive session.

Mr. SAWYER. Of course I have no disposition to interfere with the wishes of the Senator.

Mr. MANDERSON. I should be glad to go on with the printing bill.

Mr. SAWYER. If the Senator desires to proceed with his bill I shall not at this time interpose the motion. I only desired a brief executive session in order to have some messages referred.

Mr. MANDERSON. I understand the executive session would probably be a very brief one. However, I desire to submit to the wishes of the Senate as to whether I shall go on at this time with the unfinished business or not.

Several SENATORS. Let us have an executive session.

Mr. MANDERSON. As there seems to be a general desire, on the part of Senators surrounding me at least, not to go on with the unfinished business to-day, I will not press my request, but I shall be glad to go on with the bill on Monday next, and I hope we may finish it on that day.

Mr. SAWYER. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (S. 1549) providing for the public printing and binding and distribution of public documents being before the Senate, the Senator from Wisconsin moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 8, 1892, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 4, 1892.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

NEW CHANNEL, CAPE FEAR RIVER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY) laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, recommending that an appropriation be made for lighting the new channel of the Cape Fear River, North Carolina, above Reeves Point; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT AND FOG SIGNAL, WILLAMETTE RIVER, OREGON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, recommending that an appropriation be made for the establishment of a light and fog-signal station at the mouth of the Willamette River, Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CONTRACTS AND DISBURSEMENTS, POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, transmitting, as required by sections 193, 194, and 413 of the Revised Statutes, a detailed statement showing all contracts and disbursements of the Post-Office Department for the last fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department.

CLARENDON AND WHITE RIVERS, ARKANSAS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, a report of the examination and survey of the Clarendon and the lower White River, Arkansas; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

REFUND OF DIRECT TAX TO WEST VIRGINIA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a Senate joint resolution (S. R. 9) to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the governor of the State of West Virginia the sum appropriated by the act of Congress entitled "An act to credit and pay to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia all moneys collected under the direct tax levied by the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861."

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that joint resolution be taken up and considered at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to the governor of the State of West Virginia, under the provisions, conditions, and limitations of the act of Congress entitled "An act to credit and pay to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia all moneys collected under the direct tax levied by the act of Congress approved August 5, 1861," which act was approved March 2, 1891, the sum of $181,306.93, less the sum of $27,328.18, which was paid to the governor of the State of West Virginia on the 25th day of August, 1891, to be held in trust for the citizens and inhabitants of said State, notwithstanding any claim by the Government of the United States against the State of Virginia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, if there is a request for immediate action I think the joint resolution had better be read again, as it was not distinctly heard in the confusion prevailing in the Hall.

The joint resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire where this comes from; from what committee?

Mr. BURROWS. It was read subject to objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] that this is a joint resolution authorizing the Treasury Department to pay the State of West Virginia her share of the amount ordered to be refunded under the direct-tax law passed by the last Congress, notwithstanding any claim that the Government of the United States may have against the State of Virginia, the actual fact being that the Interior Department holds some bonds of the old State of Virginia, I believe, as a part of the Indian trust fund, and the Treasurer of the United States conceived that he had a right, under the statute, to refuse to pay to the State of West Virginia her share of the direct tax refund because of this claim which the Government had against the old Commonwealth. The matter, however, was examined carefully by the Senate Committee, and, after careful examination, there was a unanimous report in favor of this joint resolution, which was passed by the Senate unanimously, authorizing payment to be made to the State of West Virginia, notwithstanding this unadjusted matter between the Government of the United States and the old State of Virginia.

Mr. HOLMAN. The subject, I suppose, was referred to the Attorney-General?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I believe it was.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, has my friend got the opinion of the Attorney-General.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. The Attorney-General held that technically, under the statute, the Government had the right to hold the State of West Virginia and the State of Virginia both liable to it for the settlement of the indebtedness of the old State; but the old State is amply responsible for what it owes, and this money having been paid out of the treasury of the State of West Virginia, that State is certainly entitled to have it repaid under the law passed last session.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman in charge of this joint resolution will let it go over until we can have the opinion of the Attorney-General before us.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. The opinion of the Attorney-General was, as I have stated it, that technically the Government had the right to hold both West Virginia and old Virginia.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does this joint resolution come from any House committee?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. It comes from the Senate.

Mr. TURNER. Has the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] looked at the Georgia case decided in the Court of Claims?

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. I have not.

Mr. TURNER. That was a case in which the Treasury Department undertook to withhold an appropriation made by Congress to pay claim of the State of Georgia, on the pretext that the State was indebted to the Government under the direct-tax act. The case went to the Court of Claims, where it was decided against the Government, and the money has been paid.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. The gentleman from Indiana can see that the action of the Department in declining payment in this case is simply the enforcement of a technical rule of law. The gentleman is lawyer enough to see that the principle upon which the Department's action rests would require a settlement of all outstanding claims between the two States before this money could be paid.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am aware of the judicial decision that has been referred to; but I think this matter ought to go to the Judiciary Committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana objects to the present consideration of the joint resolution; and it will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

JUDICIAL DISTRICT IN UTAH.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a bill (S. 1604) to provide for the creation of a fourth judicial district in the Territory of Utah; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I have been authorized by the Committee on the Judiciary to report a House bill similar to the Senate bill just presented; and I ask unanimous consent that this Senate bill be taken up for immediate passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GOODNIGHT] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the Senate bill just laid before the House. The Clerk will read the bill, after which there will be opportunity for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the governor and Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah be, and they are hereby, authorized to establish a fourth judicial district in said Territory, and to readjust the districts in said Territory in such manner as to best promote the convenient administration of justice therein.

SEC. 2. That as soon as may be after the execution of the power conferred by section 1 of this act, the supreme court of said Territory shall assign one judge to each of said districts, and shall have power from time to time to change such assignments and to provide for occasions of disability or absence in such cases according to the practice now authorized by law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GOODNIGHT] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported by the Clerk. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire whether this bill proposes any increase of the existing number of judges or clerks.

Mr. CULBERSON. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GOODNIGHT] will be permitted to make an explanation of the measure.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. I would like to do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the gentleman from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope we shall have an explanation as to the effect of the bill, whether it creates any new offices or not.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. I will explain for the benefit of the gentleman from Indiana and others that the bill simply provides another district for an already existing judge. There are now four judges and only three judicial districts. Thus one judge in performing his duty is compelled to travel through these three districts. This bill simply provides for creating a new district, and reassigning the judges, so as to give one judge to each district. It does not increase expenditures to the extent of one cent. As the Legislative Assembly of the Territory is now in session, it becomes important that the bill be passed at once so that the necessary action of that body may be taken without delay.

Mr. CULBERSON. Under the existing law the Territory of Utah has four Territorial judges, who under the law meet and apportion to each other the districts where they shall preside. As has been stated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GOODNIGHT], there are four judges and only three districts. The business is sufficient to employ the time of all these judges, and the proposition in the bill is simply to allow the Legislative Assembly of Utah to establish a fourth judicial district and to permit the supreme court, now consisting of these four judges, to assign one of the number to each of these districts, so that all the judges may be engaged in the dispatch of the business of the Territory. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GOODNIGHT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. GOODNIGHT. I ask unanimous consent that the House bill, similar in its provisions to the Senate bill just passed, may be laid on the table.

There being no objection, House bill No. 528 was laid on the table.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were severally read a first and second time, and referred as stated:

A bill (S. 1215) for an extension of appropriation for the erection of a public building at Los Angeles, Cal.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (S. 1610) to increase the endowment of the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College, and for the Southern University of Louisiana—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. PRICE, for one day, on account of sickness in his family.

UNDISTRIBUTED DOCUMENTS.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present a resolution for reference to the Committee on Printing.

The title of the resolution was read, as follows:

Resolution to authorize the Committee on Printing to transfer the public documents now to the credit of ex-members of Congress to the credit of present members.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

THE RULES.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I call up for consideration the report of the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. ENLOE: Add to Rule XXIV:

"The House may, on the death of a member, order a special session of the House to be held on Sunday, and on no other day, for memorial services. On such occasions the services shall be opened by the Chaplain in the usual manner."

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I think the amendment which has just been read is one of much more importance than many of the members might suppose, who are not familiar with the consumption of time we have heretofore seen in Congress in this matter of holding sessions to pronounce eulogies over deceased members. I hope, sir, that I shall not disturb in any manner the reposeful state of mind of our friends who may have squandered or exhausted their intellectual strength and vigor in blind adoration of the ancient customs and usages of the House. I do not wish to cut off the opportunity which gentlemen may desire to express their opinions of their deceased friends and enemies, though I believe the custom should be changed or abandoned.

Nor do I question the propriety of paying a proper and respectful tribute to our departed colleagues, for, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is not a bad idea to hold up to the youth of this country in multifarious form Longfellow's idea that the—

Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time.

And that is just about the extent of the impression that the majority of the members sent to this House make in this body. It is only upon the sands that they leave their imprint, and if it were not for the eulogies and memorial services to call the attention of the country to their great merits, many of them would doubtless go down to history forgotten and to fame unknown.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is in the life of every public man who has been successful enough of merit to teach valuable lessons to the rising generations, if you can only succeed in finding the proper artist to give the right coloring to the picture and make the proper use of light and shades in its development. The custom of pronouncing funeral orations here by members is based on a sentiment for which all must have respect. But it is not necessary that we should make our respect or our grief quite so burdensome to the taxpayers of the country. These services have no connection with the public business. They are a bar to all business. They are, as they should be, in the nature of religious services; and therefore there can not be any more appropriate day for paying such tributes to a deceased member than the day fixed in the amendment—Sunday. If this is adopted I will offer an amendment providing that the proceedings shall not be published in the RECORD until the following Tuesday. The amendment also provides that the Chaplain shall open the exercises with prayer in the usual manner; and I believe, if the amendment is adopted, and we provide that these eulogies or memorial exercises shall only occur on Sunday, that the proprieties of the occasion would be much better observed than I have seen them sometimes observed on this floor, when members indulged in applause, which I do not think ought to be indulged in during memorial services. That is an innovation which I do not admire.

This is a measure in the interest of retrenchment, in the interest of economy and reform. It will be a saving of money to the taxpayers of the country. It will be a saving of time also, because we spend several weeks during a session usually in eulogies of this kind, at an expenditure of about a thousand dollars a day, while holding these services. We pay out from $1,000 to $20,000 for burying a member, besides about $1,000 for the extra cost of pronouncing eulogies, besides the expense of printing. We might, I think, make our grief much cheaper to the people, and I doubt not that it would be appreciated by the great majority of our citizens all over the country, if we should either cheapen our sorrow or forego the public expression of it.

I believe that deceased members should be buried as their constituents are buried, at their own expense. I have introduced a bill to reduce the cost of Congressional grief to the taxpayers, which, if it were adopted, would partially correct the abuses of the present custom. I know of nothing in our republican system of government which justifies such profligate grief over deceased public servants. Gentlemen generally deride every effort to reform customs and usage, and ridicule those who attack intrenched abuses, because the reckless waste of public money in obedience to custom is regarded as a sacred privilege. I dare assert that if the small leaks, the small steals, and the small peculations going on in the Government could be stopped, and all absolutely useless offices could be abolished, it would save millions of dollars to the people annually. This is only a small matter, but it is one of a numerous brood of worse evils, and if this House means to keep its pledges of reform to the people it should not hesitate to give some more substantial evidence of it than will be found in empty declarations of a purpose which it has shown too little disposition to put into execution. Every day that Congress remains in session it not only disturbs business by its threatened legislation, but when it has been in session the length of time that is imperatively necessary, every unnecessary delay in concluding the business of the session increases public dissatisfaction. This amendment would materially shorten the session, and that alone should commend it to the members and to the public.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Speaker, I trust the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee will be adopted.

Mr. ENLOE. If the gentleman will allow an interruption, I should be glad to have the amendment read, as there seems to be some misapprehension about it.

Mr. MORSE. It has been suggested by the gentleman from Tennnessee that the amendment be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If read again it will come out of the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MORSE. Very well.

The amendment was again read, as follows:

Add to Rule XXIV:

"The House may, on the death of a member, order a special session of the House, to be held on Sunday, and on no other day, for memorial services. On such occasions the services shall be opened by the Chaplain in the usual manner."

Mr. MORSE. I think there were fifteen members of the Fifty-first Congress who died during its existence. We adjourned one day on the occasion of the death of each one, and we spent a good part of another day in these mortuary honors in the House of Representatives, involving the loss of twenty or thirty legislative days during the last Congress, which this amendment will correct. I believe in these funeral services. It is wise and well on such occasions to pause and ponder the solemn and awful truth that we, too, are mortal, to ponder the fact that we have here "no continuing city," and I think such services are eminently appropriate to the Sabbath day. I am therefore very much in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE]. I believe these memorial services are educational and inspiring to the young. I bought a number of copies of the RECORD containing the memorial speeches a few days since in honor of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Houk]. Here was a man who was described by his colleagues, who knew him as a man, who was born in poverty and want sat by his cradle, as one who got his education from borrowed books by the light of a pine knot, in a corner of the fireplace; a man who never went to school but three months in his life, and yet, in spite of these untoward circumstances, he rose to be a member of the bar of Tennessee, he rose to be a judge of one of her courts, and finally for many years an honored member of this House. I say I think these memorial services are educational, that they teach the young men of our country lessons of patriotism, they teach the young that in this land above all other lands there is no royal road to learning, and that—

Honor and shame from no condition rise—

And that in this favored land of ours they may rise above the circumstances of birth.

It is eminently fit and appropriate, Mr. Speaker, that these services should be held on the Lord's day, that the people, especially the young men of Washington, may assemble here and listen to the prayers of the Chaplain, and to these memorial orations, which are largely of a religious character, in honor of our deceased members.

It might be at an hour that would not conflict with the hours of worship in the churches of the city.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Speaker, I trust that this amendment will not be adopted. It is evidently offered in the interest of those persons who never attend church, and who desire to come here on the Sabbath day and air their oratory.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that there is time enough in the six working days of the week for gentlemen to come here and do the business of this House. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] says that on his side of the House the most of the deceased members would never be heard of after death were it not for the fact that an oration is pronounced to perpetuate their memory. I beg to say we have none such on this side of the House. Let us remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy, and if we as a House have no respect for the day itself let us respect the belief of those persons who do. Let us not formally declare in the rules that we will work and compel the employés to work on Sunday.

Mr. ENLOE. If the gentleman undertakes to quote me, especially on a matter of this character, he ought to quote me correctly. Another thing, if he is apprehensive about the people who would come up here on Sunday and in that way be kept away from church, I want to say that it will not be compulsory upon them to come here any more than it is that they should go to church. People, like the gentleman, who would not go to church, might come here and be benefited by listening to a good funeral oration and by being prayed for by the Chaplain.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, it ought to be stated that the consumption of time for this purpose in the first session of the Fifty-first Congress was something over twenty-four days—nearly a month.

Mr. STOUT. Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope this resolution will pass. We have listened on this floor to several resolutions of respect to the memory of those who have passed away, but they have all been offered just at the close of the session, when we had nothing to do. Mr. Speaker, I happened once to be in the city of St. Louis when a cortege was passing through the city on its way South with the body of a member of Congress who had just died. A newspaper on the next day made the criticism that the body was left in the depot, while a Senator discussed the Presidential prospect in the rotunda of the hotel and the younger members of the delegation went to the theater, I suppose to assuage their profound grief. Let us, then, have something that will demonstrate to the country and ourselves whether we are sincere. Let us meet on Sunday, and those of us who are not sincere can stay away.

Mr. BERGEN. Mr. Speaker, this is more than an ordinary amendment. The effort is to invade the sacredness of Sunday—to make an entering wedge for the purpose in the rules of the House. The plan struck upon is to make it a business day for certain purposes only. This once done, the transition is easy from special to general business. The people of this country are much interested in the subject. We are all constantly receiving petitions that this body should, by its enactments, respect the day. I occupy no ultra position, am under no bias, but I want to respect that feeling on the subject which permeates the community generally. It would be a departure in the course of this House which can not but be misinterpreted. Never has it as a body deliberately by its rules provided for meetings on Sundays. The gentleman says it is in the interest of economy. It seems to me that it will only increase the expenses of this House. Every officeholder of this House, as I understand it, will receive additional pay from this fact, that we had called upon him for additional services.

Mr. ENLOE shook his head.

Mr. BERGEN. The gentleman from Tennessee shakes his head; but certainly all getting per diem pay would have an increase, and could we demand extra services from others without extra pay? Some suggestion is made that it would save time; we have plenty of time. This House usually only sits five hours out of the twenty-four, and very often not so many.

Mr. ENLOE. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. BERGEN. Certainly.

Mr. ENLOE. I want to say to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, so that he may not labor under any misapprehension——

Mr. BERGEN. I am glad to be relieved of any misapprehension.

Mr. ENLOE. That the session employés are paid for every day of the session, including Sunday; and if we could shorten this session, at the end of the term we will have saved $800 to $1,000 a day in the pay of session employés.

Mr. BERGEN. I am glad for the suggestion of the gentleman that this session may by any means be shortened; but we have been here a little over two months, and I have failed yet to see that there has been a single measure of importance to the country acted upon; and I have failed also to observe that there is any disposition on the part of the majority in control of this House to do any business; consequently, I see no necessity at this time for putting another working day into the week. I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. MILLIKEN addressed the Chair.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move the previous question on the pending amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BERGEN and others. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 68.

Mr. BERGEN and Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the resolution again reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment has been twice reported, but if there be no objection the Clerk will again report the resolution.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. DICKERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire upon what authority we can compel employés of this House to work on Sunday?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is hardly a parliamentary inquiry.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 91, nays 160, not voting 80; as follows:

Mr. BRANCH with Mr. TAYLOR of Illinois.

Mr. BUNN with Mr. ATKINSON.

Mr. WEADOCK with Mr. RUSSELL.

Mr. DANIELL with Mr. LODGE.

Mr. KYLE with Mr. SANFORD.

Mr. HEMPHILL with Mr. GROUT, except on rules.

On this vote:

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina with Mr. SCULL.

Mr. PRICE with Mr. REYBURN.

Mr. WISE with Mr. STORER.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I submit the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for subdivision 3:

"On Friday of each week, after the morning hour, the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar."

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the rule as printed in the report of the Committee of Rules provides "that it shall be in order" on that day "to entertain a motion" to consider bills on the Private Calendar. This amendment strikes out that portion of the report. Unless you omit these words from that subdivision the consideration of private bills on Fridays would still be prevented if the question should be raised on a motion to take up the Private Calendar. The experience of the past has been that almost invariably it has resulted in displacing the consideration of private bills and the calling up of some other question. I believe this matter is fairly understood by the House, and if they intend that Friday of each week shall be set apart for bills upon the Private Calendar they will adopt this amendment.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move the previous question on the amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Would not the effect of that amendment, if adopted, be to prevent the House, even if a majority so desired, from considering an appropriation bill on that day?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That, if not a parliamentary inquiry, is a very suggestive inquiry.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri; and there were—ayes 38, noes 74.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point that no quorum has voted, and the Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. O'NEILL, and the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. CATCHINGS.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 57, noes 111.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On the death of a member of the House during the term of his service, a committee of five members shall be appointed by the Speaker to prepare and report to the House appropriate resolutions, and on the consideration of such report there shall be no debate, but on the day following the adoption of such report all members may publish in the RECORD remarks on said resolutions.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to consume time in discussing the amendment. I would withdraw it if necessary rather than do that.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MONTGOMERY].

The substitute was read, as follows:

Resolved, That in future if any member of Congress dies during his term of service notice may be taken by resolution, briefly stating his death, worth, and services, which resolution shall be voted upon without remarks, and, if adopted, published in the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. ENLOE. Is it in order, Mr. Speaker, at this time to offer a substitute for both the pending amendments?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not. There is one substitute pending.

The substitute of Mr. CURTIS was rejected.

Mr. ENLOE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

It shall not be in order for the Speaker to entertain any motion to fix a day for pronouncing eulogies on deceased members.

The amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MONTGOMERY].

Mr. MORSE. I ask that the amendment be read.

The amendment of Mr. MONTGOMERY was again read.

The question was taken on the amendment, and the Speaker pro tempore declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I ask for a division.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 42, noes 70; so the motion was rejected.

Mr. HOUK of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

The House may set apart the last Sunday of its session for memorial services in respect to such of its members as shall have deceased during the current session, on which occasion, in case there shall not be sufficient time for oral addresses, members may have their remarks printed in the RECORD, such publication to be made under the direction of the Speaker.

Mr. HOUK of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact stated by the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], that forty days were consumed by the Fifty-first Congress in these obituary ceremonies, I think it is clear, Mr. Speaker, that a change in the method heretofore pursued on these occasions is greatly to be desired.

I fully agree with gentlemen who have commended the propriety of these observances. It is a usage of long standing, and I would not presume to suggest a substitute for the proposed rule that would reflect in the slightest degree upon its propriety. I need not say that a material saving of time in the transaction of the business of this House is a material saving of public money; and if that which is not strictly in the nature of public business, but which consumes forty or even twenty days during a session of Congress, can be better and more suitably done in one day, there can be no valid reason against making such a change.

It is not my idea at all, Mr. Speaker, that economy can be found only in the reduction of appropriations. A better, and often much wiser economy can be found in the speedy, diligent, and sensible transaction of public business—the unnecessary consumption of time in fruitless formalities, in these parliamentary methods of proceeding, has already demonstrated, to me at least, a most serious, although possibly an unavoidable, evil. The substitute I have offered assigns the last Sunday of the session to the commemorative ceremonies respecting those members who have died during its continuance.

The time and the day, it seems to me, would be alike suitable to the occasion; and those who would be denied, from want of time, the opportunity of oral addresses, could have their tributes published in the RECORD.

I am not disposed, sir, to criticise this description of literature. It deals with a subject the most profound of any that can engage the human understanding. It can never cease to be interesting to the general people. It constitutes a sort of popular biography of the public men who enter and pass from the stage of public life. But I must say that the custom which has heretofore been followed in producing and giving it to the country would, in my judgment, be not only much improved in effect, but be a substantial benefit to the public, by the adoption of the substitute I have offered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I offer another amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On the death of a member the House may order a night session only for eulogies.

Mr. ENLOE. I offer this amendment providing for night sessions for the special benefit of my friend from Texas [Mr. KILGORE], so that he can be present and make the point that there is no quorum and break them up.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a substitute for the rule.

The substitute was read as follows:

RULE XXIV.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

1. The daily order of business shall be as follows:
First. Prayer by the Chaplain.
Second. Reading and approval of the Journal.
Third. Correction of reference of public bills.
Fourth. Disposal of business on the Speaker's table.
Fifth. Unfinished business.
Sixth. The morning hour for the consideration of bills called up by committees.
Seventh. Motions to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider bills designated.
Eighth. Orders of the day.

2. Business on the Speaker's table shall be disposed of as follows:
Messages from the President, reports and communications from the heads of Departments, and other communications addressed to the House, and bills, resolutions, and messages from the Senate, shall be referred to appropriate committees without debate; but House bills with Senate amendments which do not require consideration in a Committee of the Whole may be at once disposed of as the House may determine.

3. The consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may be engaged at an adjournment, except business in the morning hour, shall be resumed as soon as the business on the Speaker's table is finished, and at the same time each day thereafter until disposed of, and the consideration of all other unfinished business shall be resumed whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order under the rules.

4. After the unfinished business has been disposed of, the Speaker shall call each standing committee in regular order, and then select committees, and each committee when named may call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day and on the House Calendar, and if the Speaker shall not complete the call of the committees before the House passes to other business he shall resume the next call where he left off, giving preference to the last bill under consideration: Provided, That whenever any committee shall have occupied the morning hour on two days it shall not be in order to call up any other bill until the other committees have been called in their turn.

5. After one hour shall have been devoted to the consideration of bills called up by committees it shall be in order, pending consideration or discussion thereof, to entertain a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, or, when authorized by a committee, to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider a particular bill, to which motion one amendment only, designating another bill, may be made; and if either motion be determined in the negative, it shall not be in order to make either motion again until the disposal of the matter under consideration or discussion.

6. On Friday of each week, after the unfinished business has been disposed of, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar; and if this motion fails, then public business shall be in order as on other days.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I do not think I need say much in order that the House shall understand precisely the nature of the proposition which I have presented. A portion of it has already been adopted by the House and incorporated into the rules. The substantial addition which this substitute would make is this: It would give you such a morning hour that it would not be in the power of a single member to kill any bill which has the sanction of one of your committees. The morning hour as it is arranged in the system of rules proposed by the Committee on Rules is a morning hour of sixty minutes, and is therefore absolutely limited as to time. In addition to that, the rule limits the time when a bill can survive for action to two days, which means two hours. If, therefore, any member chooses to take the trouble to beat any bill in the morning hour by the use of the parliamentary powers which you may give him, he can do it; because, after the consideration of the measure has lasted for two days, one hour per day, it then becomes "unfinished business," and it remains forever unfinished business.

I say that because I am quite sure that the experience of every other member who has had experience here will bear me out in the statement. What I propose is that after the House has got to the end of its sixty minutes it shall be at liberty, if it chooses, to go to some other form of business, or, if it chooses not to, it may continue and finish the bill which is under consideration. That is all the change that I propose, but it is a change from control by one man to control by the House of Representatives. I am sure that if the House could have the benefit of a knowledge of the working of the system proposed by the Committee on Rules and of the working of the system which I propose they would not hesitate for an instant to make the choice.

I beg leave to add that this proposition is not liable to the objection that it is sluicing business through the House, because, under it, nothing can be brought up that has not the approval of one of your own committees. Nor would it be possible under this provision to bring up any bill that appropriates money. It simply secures consideration of bills like bridge bills and others of that kind. It saves the time of the House and the patience of the Speaker. It is not an invention of the Fifty-first Congress, but it is a recurrence to the system which existed before the Forty-fifth Congress, and was found to work advantageously. I sincerely hope that in the interest of public business the House will adopt this proposition, which has only the scope I have explained.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. REED, there were—ayes 75, noes 68.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I think there is some misapprehension——

Mr. McMILLIN. I am willing that the vote be taken first by tellers.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I was about to suggest that there seems to be some misapprehension as to the effect of this amendment; and I ask unanimous consent that it be again read before another vote is taken.

Mr. McMILLIN. Very well; I withdraw my demand——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the demand be withdrawn, the Chair must announce the result of the vote.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let us have tellers.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will ask that the vote be first taken by tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending the demand for tellers, unanimous consent is asked that the substitute may be again reported.

There was no objection.

Mr. REED. I hope that in reporting the substitute again the Clerk will omit the provision in reference to Senate bills, which was intended to be struck out.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. There seems to be some misunderstanding.

Mr. REED. The intention was to omit the provision in regard to Senate bills. The substitute as submitted refers solely to bills of the House which are designated by House committees.

The Clerk again read the substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On the substitute which has been again reported the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] asks for tellers.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] be permitted to occupy five minutes in explaining the effect of the rule as submitted.

Mr. McMILLIN. No; if the House wants to adopt the other system, let it do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman make that request?

Mr. SPRINGER. I made the request; but if the gentleman from Tennessee does not desire to occupy any time——

Mr. REED. What is the request?

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. With the understanding that the same privilege shall be allowed to every other member, I have no objection.

Mr. REED. What is the request?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The request has been withdrawn.

Mr. REED. I should be very glad for my part to have thorough debate on the subject. I believe that if the House understood the question the result would be favorable to my proposition.

Mr. SPRINGER. Objection was made.

Mr. REED. I have no objection to the fullest debate; nor would I object, even if it were limited to a reply to what I have said.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the demand for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. REED and Mr. CATCHINGS were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 104.

So the amendment of Mr. REED was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its secretaries, announced that the Senate requested the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the joint resolution (S. 9) to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the governor of the State of West Virginia the sum appropriated by the act of Congress entitled "An act to credit and pay to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia all moneys collected under the direct tax levied by act of Congress, approved August 5, 1861."

THE RULES.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. CHIPMAN submits the following amendment, to stand as clause 3 of Rule XXVI:

"3. Every Friday, unless otherwise ordered by the House, there shall be a session of the House to begin at 8 o'clock p. m. and to terminate at half past 10 o'clock p. m., to consider and dispose of bills to remove political disabilities of individuals and private bills reported by the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions."

The SPEAKER pro tempore (having put the question on agreeing to the amendment). The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. KILGORE. Let us have a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 100, noes 3.

So the amendment of Mr. CHIPMAN was adopted.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, the amendment just adopted is the substance of one I had printed in the RECORD, and I desire now permission to insert in the RECORD a short history of these evening sessions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois and others objected.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. The second and fourth Mondays in each month, after the call of States and Territories, shall, when claimed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, be set apart for the consideration of such business as may be presented by said committee.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I offer the following amendment, to make this conform to the action taken heretofore.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend clause 2 by striking out the words "after the call of States and Territories."

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XXVIII.

CHANGE OR SUSPENSION OF RULES.

1. No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice of the motion therefor, and no rule shall be suspended except by a vote of two-thirds of the members present, nor shall the Speaker entertain a motion to suspend the rules except on the first and third Mondays of each month after the call of States and Territories shall have been completed or one hour shall have been devoted thereto, preference being given on the first Monday to individuals and on the third Monday to committees, and during the last six days of a session.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I offer the amendment I send to the desk to make the section conform.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in the sixth and seventh lines the words "after the call of States and Territories shall have been completed, or one hour shall have been devoted thereto."

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the first paragraph of this rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the first paragraph:

"And motions to suspend the rules shall be made on said days without naming the bills thereafter to be considered, which shall be determined by a majority of the members present, in the ascertainment of which no dilatory motions shall be allowed."

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, this amendment is somewhat of an innovation. It is a change almost as radical as the one inaugurated by the rules of the Fifty-first Congress, which allowed the Speaker to count the members actually present in ascertaining the presence of a quorum; and yet I think it ought to be made. It is certainly a change in the right direction. What I propose is that we shall apply on suspension days, the two days in every month when all rules are suspended, the rule applied in the last Congress to other days of the month, the rule applied when the House was in the Committee of the Whole.

Paragraph 4, Rule XXIII, of the Fifty-first Congress reads as follows:

In Committees of the Whole House business on their Calendars may be taken up in regular order, or in such order as the committee may determine, etc.

This rule applied on suspension days would allow the House to determine what bills should be considered and their order.

There has been a great deal said in this House during the present session about the tyranny of the last House and the rules which clothed the Speaker with extraordinary powers. It has been insisted that the rules of the last House gave the presiding officer too much power, and thereby gave him absolute control of all legislation.

But there never was a rule in any parliamentary body in the world that gave to the presiding officer more power than is given in the rule which we are now considering, notwithstanding it is an old rule and has been in force in all of the preceding Congresses. I can see no reason why the Speaker should be clothed with the extraordinary power of controlling legislation on suspension days, and yet he has absolute power in this direction and designates the bills on the Calendar which are brought before the House for consideration. And this is the power which he is to exercise under the rules we are now considering.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield for a question?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have before me the resolution or amendment proposed by the gentleman, and I must confess I am unable to understand the scope to which he desires it to apply. Is it the object of the gentleman that when a member makes the motion in question he shall not disclose the bill he desires to have action taken upon?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. The object of the amendment is this: As the rule now stands the Speaker has no right to entertain a motion to suspend the rules except on the first and third Mondays of each month and on the last six days of each session, and my amendment contemplates that on any of these days a motion shall be made to suspend the rules for the consideration of bills on the Calendar, and after the rules are suspended the House shall determine what bill or measure shall have priority, just as the Committee of the Whole House did in the last Congress.

This is democratic, and it is right. There are times when the Calendar of this House will contain a thousand bills, one-half of which would pass by a two-thirds vote if they could be reached or considered, but they are never reached because the Speaker will not recognize the members having them in charge.

Go to the Speaker's room by day or by night, toward the end of a session, and you will see his room crowded with members begging recognition for some bill in which they or their constituents are deeply interested. The Speaker alone decides what measures shall be considered. He has the absolute power of saying what measures shall and what measures shall not be considered. Is his judgment better than the judgment of the House? Is the judgment of one man worth more than the judgment of three hundred men?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a few minutes longer. I have been absent during most of this discussion and I have not occupied any of the time of the House since the discussion of the rules began.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I hope the gentleman may have five minutes longer and then we will ask a vote.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I have seen a river and harbor bill carrying $20,000,000 pass this House, or a former House, on suspension day when there could be only thirty minutes' discussion, fifteen minutes on each side, and when no solitary amendment could be offered. It passed and became a law because the Speaker of the House saw proper to recognize the member having it in charge.

Five hundred other bills, a hundredfold more meritorious, never had an hour or a moment's consideration. Why should we trust the Speaker in preference to ourselves in so important a matter? Why should he have the absolute power of saying that certain measures shall have no opportunity of being considered? Is not that tyranny? Is not that "one-man power?" Is not that czarism? Is not that absolute power, such as you find nowhere except in European monarchies? My amendment proposes to take this power away from the Speaker, and I have no doubt that this change would be welcomed by the Speaker more than by any other member of this House, as it would relieve him of a great burden and of a great responsibility.

It has more than once been charged that Speakers were improperly influenced in recognizing or refusing to recognize the mover of certain bills; and it has been charged that certain measures in which great corporations were interested were favored by the Speaker who permitted them to be considered. Favoritism in such recognitions, or in the refusal to recognize members who have certain measures in charge, would be charged, whether there was any ground for it or not, under a system which imposes such prerogatives on the presiding officer.

This is the English idea of a presiding officer. It is a relic of monarchical power. You will find it everywhere in Europe, but you will not find it in this country outside of these rules, because in this country majorities control in State and nation. The majority in this House should determine, just as we did in Committee of the Whole, by a vote, what bill should be taken up, what bill should be considered, what bill should pass, and what bill shall not be considered.

Mr. Speaker, this rule is not only wrong in principle, but it imposes upon members a duty that is somewhat humiliating. To be required to go to the Speaker and importune him for recognition day after day is certainly imposing upon a member an unpleasant duty. I think this House should determine, where all are equals, Speaker and members, just what should be done on suspension days, just as we do in the Committee of the Whole. This is too important a matter to be relegated to one man.

On suspension days we have no rules if the motion to suspend prevails. Every rule of parliamentary law is set aside for the time, and we are called upon to vote for or against measures almost without debate and without any power to amend in any particular. You propose to put a great deal of power in the hands of five men, the Committee on Rules, three of whom constitute a majority, but you have not given them such absolute power as the Speaker will have under this rule if it is not amended.

The power given to the Speaker, under the rules of the last House, to count the members present, was no such power as is given under this rule. I would a thousand times rather trust a Speaker in the presence of the House than in the privacy of his room, where he may be importuned to promise recognitions because of the importunities and not because of the merit of the measure which he promises to aid by recognition on suspension day; very few people know the character or extent of the arguments or influences which are brought to bear upon the Speaker.

There is no limit to the number of men who have access to the Speaker to urge this recognition. The doors of his room are open to all. The agent or attorney, the friend or foe of any measure, the advocate of any scheme is entitled to the ear of a kind and courteous Speaker, and he must have more than human wisdom, more than human power, not to be moved by some of these influences.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I would like a little further time, or at least leave to print additional remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Speaker, I find that in the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress, February 18, 1884, Mr. Matson, under instructions from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, asked consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That, until the further order of this House, on each Friday the House will take a recess at 5 o'clock until 7:30 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall be considered.

Motion seconded by tellers.

Mr. A. J. Warner moved that the House adjourn. Lost—yeas 56, nays 135, not voting 129. Yeas and nays demanded, and upon this vote the House refused to adjourn.

The question was then put on the suspension of the rules, and two-thirds having voted in the affirmative, the rules were suspended and the resolution adopted. (House Journal, first session Forty-eighth Congress, page 614.)

Mr. Matson again in the Forty-ninth Congress, this rule having proved so satisfactory, on the 15th day of January, 1886, by unanimous consent, offered the resolution, enlarged by including "bills reported from the Judiciary Committee to remove political disabilities," which was considered by the House by unanimous consent and agreed to without division.

The resolution then adopted was in the following language:

That on each Friday the House shall take a recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7:30, at which evening sessions private bills reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions and bills reported from the Judiciary Committee to remove political disabilities only shall be considered.—House Journal, first session Forty-ninth Congress, page 367.

Again in the Fiftieth Congress, on the 29th day of February, 1888, Mr. Matson, by unanimous consent, offered this resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That until further ordered, on each Friday, at 5 o'clock p. m., the House shall take a recess until 7:30 p. m., and after the 15th day of April next until 8 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar granting pensions, reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions, bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, removing political disabilities, shall be considered; and no other business shall be transacted at such evening sessions; and the House shall adjourn on each of said evenings not later than 10:30 p. m.—House Journal, first session Fiftieth Congress, page 987.

On March 2, Mr. Randall, from the Committee on Rules, reported back the resolution without change, and after some debate as to the propriety of including the removal of desertions in the resolution it was passed without division. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, first session Fiftieth Congress, page 1666.)

In the Fifty-first Congress it was incorporated in and as a part of Rule XXVI in the language of the amendment I have offered, which adds to the former resolution consideration of bills for removal of desertion.

This amendment was reoffered by Mr. CHIPMAN in the same language, as I understand, and the House has just adopted it. It adds to the former resolution consideration of bills for the removal of the charge of desertion.

I was informed there would be decided opposition to placing this in the rules; that it could be covered by resolution. I am glad that no opposition has developed.

There can certainly be no good reason why the action of the Committee on Invalid Pensions should not be governed by a rule, as are other committees. I deem its business as important as that of other committees, and it should be as well treated.

Let the men in whose interest these Friday evening sessions are held know that their interests are protected by a rule of the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us have a vote. I demand the previous question on the amendment.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I desire to have read a short letter in regard to recognition of members on suspension days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order, the previous question having been demanded.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Would it not accomplish the gentleman's purpose as well to have the letter inserted in the RECORD?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. No; I would like to have it read. It is a letter written by three members of the present House to Speaker CARLISLE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Tennessee insist upon his demand for the previous question?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I insist on it. I want to get through with the consideration of this subject.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. It will take less time now than it will later.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR) there were—ayes 77, noes 33.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point that no quorum has voted. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR, and the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. MCMILLIN. Gentlemen who support the demand for the previous question will first pass between the tellers.

Pending the announcement of the vote by tellers,

The SPEAKER pro tempore said: No quorum has voted. Gentlemen will please come forward and vote on one side or the other of this question.

Further pending the announcement of the vote,

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota said: Mr. Speaker, I ask for an announcement of this vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The tellers have not yet completed the count.

The tellers reported—ayes 132, noes 14.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] insists upon the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It would be better, would it not, to call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLAND. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, rather than waste so much time as that would involve I will withdraw the point.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR] withdraws his point that no quorum has voted. Does the gentleman from Missouri withdraw his demand for the yeas and nays?

Mr. BLAND. I do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore then announced that the demand for the previous question was sustained, and that the question was on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR].

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. When a motion to suspend the rules has been seconded, it shall be in order, before the final vote is taken thereon, to debate the proposition to be voted upon for thirty minutes, one-half of such time to be given to debate in favor of, and one-half to debate in opposition to, such proposition, and the same right of debate shall be allowed whenever the previous question has been ordered on any proposition on which there has been no debate.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last clause.

In support of my amendment I desire to call the attention of this House to the fact that in the Forty-ninth Congress three distinguished gentlemen, all Democrats, two of whom are now members of this House, and the other would be if he were living, the lamented Samuel J. Randall, made a request that some Democrat be recognized on suspension day to present a measure which had the support of a large majority of that House.

The Hon. GEORGE D. WISE, of Virginia, and the Hon. JOHN S. HENDERSON, who now sit on the other side of this Chamber, joined the Hon. Samuel J. Randall in this request, but the request was refused by Speaker CARLISLE, who persisted in his refusal till the last hours of the Forty-ninth Congress expired, although the request was insisted upon by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, the greatest Democrat of the nation, and the two gentlemen I have named. They did not ask recognition for themselves; they asked recognition for a measure which the country demanded. They asked for the consideration of a measure that was supposed then to have the support of fully three-fourths of the members of the Forty-ninth Congress, a measure to which there was very little opposition in either end of the Capitol. They laid this request before the Speaker and the country, and yet it was refused.

I send up to the Clerk's desk to have read the letter written by these gentlemen and the reply made by Speaker CARLISLE. This urgent request made by the late Samuel J. Randall, whose eulogies uttered only the other day still echo in this Hall, was refused. I present this letter and the reply of the Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE, who was then Speaker, as an illustration of what can be done under these rules without this amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1887.

DEAR SIR: At the instance of many Democratic members of the House, we appeal to you most earnestly to recognize, on Monday next, some Democrat who will move to suspend the rules for the purpose of giving the House an opportunity of considering the question of the total repeal of the internal-revenue taxes on tobacco.

Many Republican members, we have reason to believe, are anxious to make such a motion. We believe the country is ready for the repeal of these taxes and that a large majority of the House will so vote when an opportunity occurs.

For a Republican to make the motion would give the Republican party all the credit accruing therefrom and would almost certainly cause the loss to the Democracy of not less than two Southern States at the general election in the year 1888. This is an isolated proposition, and we believe will command more votes than any other measure pending before the House looking towards a reduction in taxation; and favorable action on this proposition will not interfere with other efforts that are being made to reduce the burden of the people.

Yours, respectfully,

GEORGE D. WISE.
JOHN S. HENDERSON.
SAMUEL J. RANDALL.

Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE,
House of Representatives.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Read the reply.

The Clerk read as follows:

SPEAKER'S ROOM,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., February 7, 1887.

GENTLEMEN: Your favor of the 5th instant, requesting me to recognize some Democrat "who will move to suspend the rules for the purpose of giving the House an opportunity of considering the question of the total repeal of the internal-revenue tax on tobacco," was duly received and has been carefully considered.

A week ago, in compliance with the request made by you and other gentlemen, I consulted fully with the Democratic members of the Committee on Ways and Means for the purpose of endeavoring to formulate some measure for the reduction of taxation which would meet with the approval of our political friends and enable us to accomplish something practical in that direction during the present session of Congress. The bill which you then submitted for their consideration proposed legislation upon both branches of our revenue laws, and on the 3d instant it was returned to you with such modifications and changes as were necessary in order to make it acceptable to the gentlemen to whom it had been submitted.

In order, however, that our efforts to secure reduction of taxation might not fail on account of our inability to agree upon a measure in advance, we at the same time submitted certain alternative propositions, some one or more of which we hoped might be acceptable to you. Among other things we proposed to submit the entire subject to a caucus of our political friends, with the understanding that all parties would abide by the result of its action, and in case that course was not satisfactory to you we informed you that we would at any time, upon a reasonable notice, support a motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering House bill 9702, introduced by Mr. Randall at the last session. That bill relates to internal-revenue tax on manufactured tobacco, snuff, and cigars.

We have received no response to that communication, and I consider that it would not be proper, under the circumstances, for me to agree to a course of action which would present for the consideration of the House a simple proposition for the repeal of the internal-revenue tax on tobacco, snuff, and cigars, to the exclusion of all other measures for the reduction of taxation.

Sincerely hoping that some plan may yet be devised which will enable the House to consider the whole subject of revenue reduction,

I am, very truly, yours,

J. G. CARLISLE.

Hon. GEORGE D. WISE,
Hon. JOHN S. HENDERSON,
Hon. SAMUEL J. RANDALL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Just a moment more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the gentleman from Kentucky is recognized.

Mr. CARUTH. Mr. Speaker, I did not rise for the purpose of making a defense of the Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE, ex-Speaker of the House of Representatives. His name and fame are part and parcel of the legislative history of this country. I venture the assertion that no man ever retired from that chair who had more thoroughly the confidence of this House, of both political parties, than Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Impartiality was synonymous with his name, and wherever called upon to name a person who has made a great Speaker of the House of Representatives, the first name that arises in the mind of every well-informed man in America is the name of ex-Speaker CARLISLE.

But, I did not rise, as I said before, to enter into a defense of his conduct. I found by an investigation of the subject that this discussion was about to end this day, and I thought perchance it would not do for it to pass into history without adding my part to the literature of this debate. [Laughter.]

Why, Mr. Speaker, I think that if you will examine the legislative history of this country it will be seen that this same debate has been carried on at the organization of every Congress where there has been a change of party from the formation of the Government up to this good hour. Why, sir, if an old member who had been outside of these halls for fifty years were to walk down into this Chamber he would see different occupants, but would hear the same old arguments. He would be in the condition of that man who was said to have returned to the scenes of his boyhood days and who visited once more the college in which he was educated. In the room in which he formerly lodged he would find another occupant, but see the same old furniture and hear the same old lie. [Laughter.]

When it is necessary to sustain any proposition, all you have got to do is to retire to the library, and you can prove that there has been a change of sentiment in behalf of every measure presented to Congress. Why, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], leader of this side of the House, and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], the distinguished leader on that side of the House, have been confronting us with the same arguments made from different standpoints. The gentleman from Maine opposing it in one instance and favoring it in another, and the gentleman from Illinois favoring it in one instance and opposing it in another. Why, they change with the different circumstances. It is like the girl who was being courted, who at night said "yes," and in the morning said "no." [Laughter.]

"Yes, sir," I answered you last night;
"No, sir," I say to-day;
Colors seen by candlelight
Are not the same by day.

[Laughter.]

Here are the leaders adapting their arguments to the peculiar occasion that confronts them; and he is said to be the best and boldest leader of a political party who tramples precedents and customs under foot. Why, Mr. Speaker, I made a few remarks when we were considering the rules in the Fifty-first Congress, and I said in those remarks that I opposed that policy which magnified the Speaker, glorified the committees, and dwarfed the individual members of the House; and if I believed these were the same rules in effect under which so much tyranny was exercised my voice would be raised in opposition, notwithstanding they are reported by a Democratic committee. But they are not the same rules.

I understand that they increase the importance, to a certain extent, of the individual member; and I am in favor of that. I do not believe that a man ought to be compelled to go to the Speaker of the House on bended knee and ask for recognition. He is sent here as the representative of his people. It is his duty to represent them to the best of his ability, and not to "crook the pregnant hinges of the knee where thrift may follow fawning."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CARUTH. I would like to have some more time. I have not made a speech in this Congress, and I was just getting in a good way of talking.

Mr. ARNOLD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky may be allowed to proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. CARUTH. I thank the House. Every one of my colleagues from Kentucky, I believe, with, perhaps, one exception, has made a speech at this session, but I have not tried the acoustic properties of the Hall at all. [Laughter.] I object, I say, to the great power that is put in the hands of the Speaker of this House. We might as well abolish the body as to make him the general legislator of the country. I have heard the wife of a distinguished ex-Speaker say that she would rather her husband should hold the office of Speaker than any other office in the Government, save that of President of the United States. Why, sir, at the last session of Congress, when my friend from Maine [Mr. REED]—the gentleman who has such peculiar ideas upon the subject of time that he says twenty-four days make a month, and objects to sixty minutes being an hour [laughter]—at the last session of Congress, I say, when he sat there in his Speaker's chair, he acted in such a manner as if he would say to all the world:

'Tis air I tread.
And at each step
I feel my advanced head
Knock out a star in heaven!

[Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, when you and I and all of us returned home to our people, we found our districts placarded with immense pictures representing the Hall of the House of Representatives, with the Republican side all full, while upon this side there stood but one leader, the brave, long-haired son of Virginia [Mr. O'FERRALL], battling for the rights of the people. But, notwithstanding we had vacated these chairs, the gentlemen on the other side managed to unseat the Representatives whom the people had elected, and to increase their own majority. I heard a Republican say that it put him in mind of a man who went coon-hunting in the forest. Looking up at a stalwart tree, he thought there might be a coon lodged somewhere in its branches, and when the ax was laid to the root of the tree and it was brought low, behold, instead of one coon there were two! So, in about five minutes of that eventful day in this Hall, instead of seating one colored Representative, they seated two—two coons in place of the elected Representatives of the people. [Laughter.]

But, thank God, although those pictures were displayed, and although the boot of my friend from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] took part as an issue of the Congressional campaign, thank God, I say, every seat on this side is now full and we have slopped over on to the other side. [Laughter.] And now the gentleman from Maine leads a forlorn hope, scarcely enough to do what little business he does, and God knows that is little enough.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that while I oppose the rules proposed by the gentleman from Maine, I approve the rules reported by the Committee on Rules, because they augment the power of the individual member. I want to put it in the power of members of this House to represent their constituencies upon this floor without waiting for the ipse dixit of any one man. I am here as the accredited representative of my constituents; I have a right to lift my voice in their behalf and for their interest, and it is my purpose so to do. I thank the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that the gentleman's [Mr. CARUTH'S] defense of Speaker CARLISLE, so far as I am concerned and so far as this House is concerned, was entirely unnecessary. I made no accusation whatever against Mr. CARLISLE. I made no accusation against him or against the present Speaker. I only presented this correspondence as an illustration of the great power which the rules confer upon the Speaker of the House. I used this correspondence merely as an illustration. I have always spoken in the highest terms of Speaker CARLISLE and honor him for his great ability and for his remarkable impartiality.

Gentlemen talked about the "reign of terror" in the last House, and I referred them to the reign of terror in the Forty-ninth Congress, to the reign of terror in this Congress, to the reign of terror which has existed in every Congress for one hundred years. I reflect upon no individual; I call in question no man's integrity. You thrust this power upon your Speaker, and compel him to exercise it; and Speakers only do what they feel bound to do under such rules. I desired to call the attention of the House and the country to what I regard a great wrong.

This is a republican Government, and must be governed, if governed at all, by majorities. We made two steps forward in the last Congress; we suppressed dilatory motions and allowed the Speaker to count all of the members actually present in ascertaining a quorum. If we make two steps backward in this House we will probably make three steps forward in the next, and the third step will probably be in the direction I have indicated.

No member of this House has a right to surrender to the Speaker any right or privilege which belongs to him under the Constitution. In every Congress hundreds of the most important bills go to the graveyard of legislation—the House Calendar, where burials are many and resurrections few, because the members of this House join hands in creating a system of rules that lock the wheels of legislation and stand in the way of progress. Let a majority of the members of this House decide what we shall do and what we shall not do and I shall be content, but I am forever opposed to arbitrary power wherever it may be lodged.

The Clerk read as follows:

1. At the commencement of each Congress, immediately after the Members and Delegates are sworn in, the Clerk shall place in a box prepared for that purpose a number of small balls of marble or other material equal to the number of Members and Delegates, which balls shall be consecutively numbered and thoroughly intermingled, and at such hour as shall be fixed by the House for that purpose, by the hands of a page, draw said balls one by one from the box and announce the number as it is drawn, upon which announcement the Member or Delegate whose name on a numbered alphabetical list shall correspond with the number on the ball shall advance and choose his seat for the term for which he is elected.

2. Before said drawing shall commence each seat shall be vacated and so remain until selected under this rule, and any seat having been selected shall be deemed forfeited if left unoccupied before the call of the roll is finished, and whenever the seats of Members and Delegates shall have been drawn no proposition for a second drawing shall be in order during that Congress.

Mr. OTIS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In Rule XXXII, section 2, line 4, after the word "unoccupied" insert "in person by the member entitled thereto."

Mr. OTIS. Mr. Speaker, I offer that amendment to prevent the "paging" of seats while the drawing is going on. I speak from experience in this matter. When I took my seat at this desk there was a ticket with the name of a gentleman upon it under the lid of the desk. It was then taken and placed upon another desk. The gentleman from South Carolina near me [Mr. STACKHOUSE] was informed that the seat which he now holds had been preoccupied by some party whose name seemed to be on the slip, but when the gentleman from South Carolina took the seat, then the slip was passed to a seat in front of me and a page was sent to secure that seat for some gentleman whose name had not yet been called; but, at my suggestion, the gentleman now occupying the seat [Mr. SIMPSON] came and took it, and but for that he might have been relegated to a dark corner. I trust the amendment will be adopted.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. OTIS, it was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XXXIV.

OF ADMISSION TO THE FLOOR.

The persons hereinafter named, and none other, shall be admitted to the Hall of the House or rooms leading thereto, viz: The President and Vice-President of the United States and their private secretaries, judges of the Supreme Court, members of Congress and members elect contestants in election cases during the pendency of their cases in the House, the Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, heads of Departments, foreign ministers, governors of States, the Architect of the Capitol, the Librarian of Congress and his assistant in charge of the law library, such persons as have by name received the thanks of Congress, ex-members of the House of Representatives who are not interested in any claim or directly in any bill pending before Congress, and clerks of committees, when business from their committee is under consideration; and it shall not be in order for the Speaker to entertain a request for the suspension of this rule or to present from the chair the request of any member for unanimous consent.

Mr. McRAE. I send to the desk an amendment to the rule just read. It is rather a transposition of the language than anything else.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in lines 12 and 13, the words "directly in any" and insert between the word "not" and the word "interest," in line 12, the word "directly."

Mr. DINGLEY and others. How will the clause then read?

The Clerk read the clause as proposed to be amended, as follows:

Ex-members of the House of Representatives who are not directly interested in any claim or bill pending before Congress, etc.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think that my friend from Arkansas on examination will find that this amendment relaxes rather than makes more stringent the rule as to the admission of persons having claims or bills pending here. I am sure he does not wish to offer an amendment having that effect. I thought on first blush that his amendment was an improvement. I will not insist on my point, if the House is of a different opinion.

Mr. McRAE. My amendment in fact makes the rule more stringent; makes it harder for any person directly interested in any pending bill or claim to obtain admission to the floor.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Would not the rule be strengthened by striking out altogether the word "directly?"

Mr. McMILLIN. Yes.

Mr. McRAE. Very well; let that word be omitted.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. It is by a play upon that word "directly" that some persons really interested in matters pending here have obtained admission to the floor for the purpose of lobbying. They claim that they are not "directly" interested.

Mr. McMILLIN. My reason for suggesting that the amendment would operate as a relaxation of the rule was that the insertion of the word "directly," before the word "instead" would qualify the prohibition instead of leaving it unqualified.

Mr. McRAE. Very well; let the word "directly" be struck out.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then I have no objection to the transposition.

The clause as proposed to be amended was read, as follows:

Ex-members of the House of Representatives who are not interested in any claim or bill pending before Congress, etc.

Mr. McRAE. That is right.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. McRAE, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

2. Stenographers and reporters, other than the official reporters of the House, wishing to take down the debates and proceedings, may be admitted by the Speaker to the reporters' gallery over the Speaker's chair, under such regulations as he may, from time to time, prescribe; and he may assign two seats on the floor to Associated Press reporters and regulate the occupation of the same.

Mr. McMILLIN. For the purpose of giving the United Press Association equal privileges on this floor with the Associated Press I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "assign," in the second paragraph of Rule XXXVI, and insert the following:

"Seats on the floor to a representative of both the Associated and the United Press Association, and may admit to the privileges of the floor an assistant to each of such representatives."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

JEFFERSON'S MANUAL.

The rules of parliamentary practice comprised in Jefferson's Manual shall govern the House in all cases to which they are applicable, and in which they are not inconsistent with the standing rules and orders of the House and joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. I move to amend by inserting as a new rule, after the rule just read, the paragraph which I send to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules shall report back to the House within ten days all amendments to the rules referred to said committee.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, we are conferring extraordinary powers on the Committee on Rules. There are many extraordinary provisions in this code which we are adopting, and simply out of abundance of caution, in order that the House may have power to regulate and control its business, I believe that amendments to the rules when referred to that committee should within a reasonable time be reported back to this House for its action. I say this without any desire to find fault with members of the committee, but I recognize that it is not wise to place in the hands of any committee too much power where the interests of the people are involved. This House should retain the right to regulate and control its own business.

The Committee on Rules can not object to this provision. No men should want to exercise power as against the will of the House; any members desiring such power would be the very ones we could not afford to trust. I hope, therefore, this proposed rule will be adopted. If ten days be regarded as too short a time within which to require reports to be made, let the provision be modified in that respect. It occurred to me that ten days would be a reasonable time to enable the Committee on Rules to report back to the House any proposition referred to it looking to a change in the rules.

Mr. McMILLIN. One word in response to what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] has said. I presume there will be no disposition on the part of the Committee on Rules to prevent or delay the consideration of any matter referred to it.

But this is applying to this committee a rule that is not applicable to any other committee of the House, the necessity of submitting reports upon all matters referred to it within ten days. The gentleman himself, on a previous occasion, was chairman of an important committee of the House, and he knows how utterly impossible it would have been for that committee, of which he was chairman, to have reported back all the measures submitted to it within ten days. Some of them they were not able to report at all, and at least half, I should say, of the measures so referred were not reached by the committee.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. My friend from Tennessee misunderstands my object entirely. I mean that the Committee on Rules, within ten days after a proposition for a modification or change of any rule is referred to it, should be required to report it back, either favorably or adversely, to the House. In other words, I do not think the Committee on Rules should have the power to pocket or pigeonhole amendments referred to it.

Mr. McMILLIN. But the gentleman forgets that the Committee on Rules, like all other committees, is subject to instructions by the House by resolution or by recommittal.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. My friend misunderstands me again. He certainly knows that the Committee on Rules will have control of the business of the House. There is no way to instruct the committee by resolution. After the passage of this code of rules we are tied hand and foot. We can not have a day set for the consideration of any bill except through the Committee on Rules. We can do nothing except the Committee on Rules will permit. The House should not be absolutely at the mercy of any committee, but retain the power to modify or change rules by proper amendments, referred through the House to the committee, upon which they would be compelled to report and upon which the House could act. Before you complete the rules at this point you should adopt this safeguard. The committee is privileged to report at any time, and I believe in giving them all the power that is necessary, but not to the extent that it can be abused, which could be done if you permit them to pocket any amendment to the rules. They should be required to report it to the House, and let the majority of the House, the representatives of the people, decide if they desire to make changes in existing rules. I know by experience, as every other member here must know, the necessity for such a provision in the rules.

Mr. BLAND. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. BLAND. I take it for granted that every member would probably want some change in the rules from time to time. There are three hundred and thirty-odd members, and that would make three hundred and thirty propositions which might be submitted to the committee and a report compelled within ten days if this rule is adopted. We have spent a long enough time now upon the rules, but we would never get done if such a provision as that was adopted.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. My friend and colleague is not serious.

Mr. BLAND. Oh, yes.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Well, at all events, it is not reasonable to presume that 330, or even 20 or 10 members, would be likely to offer amendments which would necessitate the Committee on Rules to report them all back within ten days. But it is to be presumed that a member of Congress would only offer an amendment to the rules where he deemed the interest of the public business was to be promoted by it. It is not a supposable case that everybody, for the mere humor of the thing and for the privilege of having this committee report back his resolution within ten days, would take up the time of the House by offering unnecessary and unwarranted amendments. You may need this yourself, my friend, before you get through this session. I do not propose to leave it to three or five men to decide what the business shall be. I do not propose, without calling attention to it, to see rules adopted that deprive the Representatives of their rights. For one, I do not intend, if I can help it, to put my head into the halter.

Mr. McMILLIN. The State will give notice on that subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Yes; and in your case you would simply plead guilty at once. [Laughter.]

Now, this amendment is all right, and the gentleman from Tennessee knows it. He is one of the best-natured and brightest men in the House. He knows that the rule I propose here is right and ought to be adopted.

Mr. McMILLIN. Let us have the vote.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 39, noes 73.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XLV.

RULES OF THE HOUSE.

These rules shall be the rules of the House of Representatives of the present and succeeding Congresses, unless otherwise ordered.

Mr. BURROWS. I move to strike out Rule XLV as proposed by this code. Of course it will be conceded, Mr. Speaker, that this Congress has no power to establish rules for the next Congress. It may as well be left out here, as it was left out in the last revision of the rules.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan will not prevail. I for one can not concede the principle stated by the gentleman. The rule which the gentleman from Michigan proposes to have stricken out has been embodied in every code of rules adopted by the House for many Congresses, until, I believe, the last—the Fifty-first Congress—when it was for the first time omitted. I am one of those, Mr. Speaker, who entertain the opinion and believe that the House of Representatives has the power to establish rules, which, until altered, changed, or rescinded, are binding upon succeeding Houses. I do not mean to say that a succeeding House may not adopt rules, or that it has not full power to modify, change, amend, rescind, or repeal altogether the rules of a former Congress; but until such ensuing House does take some such affirmative action in the premises, I submit that a code of rules, adopted by the House of Representatives in pursuance of its constitutional power, are in force and binding until set aside by such affirmative action. When the House of Representatives exercises this constitutional power of adopting rules to regulate its proceedings, I contend that, reasoning by way of analogy, such rules have the same efficacy, force, and effect upon that body as a law of Congress or a decision of the Supreme Court, which, as we all will concede, are binding until repealed or reversed by the same power that originally ordained them. When rules regulating the course of procedure in this body are so established they are the rules, not of "a House of Representatives," but the rules of "the House of Representatives," an organic body created by the Constitution.

Mr. BURROWS. What does my friend do with that provision of the Constitution which gives to each House the power to make its own rules?

Mr. REILLY. Ah! Therein lies the great point of difference between us—as to the construction which is to be placed on that clause of the Constitution; but I submit that this clause of the Constitution meant and was intended to mean that each House should be entirely independent in the matter of regulating its own course of proceedings, and was embraced in the Constitution so as to remove the difficulty and embarrassment that might occur if it was necessary to have the concurrent action of both Houses to adopt a mode of procedure, which would be the case if the provision as it now is was not inserted. To illustrate: Suppose the provision on this subject was, "Congress may make rules," etc., would anyone contend that when Congress did make a rule, it would fall at the expiration of every Congress? Surely not. And the word "each," as used in that connection in the Constitution, applies to the two bodies that compose the Congress of the United States. I do not believe that the construction placed upon these words, "each House," as being tantamount to each House of Representatives, is correct. The Congress is composed of two bodies—two Houses—which it designates respectively the Senate and the House of Representatives, and in the Constitution, when it speaks specifically of the Senate or upper House, it applies the term "Senate," and when speaking of the House of Representatives, the other House, it is designated as "The House of Representatives;" but when referring to the two bodies collectively the word "House" is applied to designate both; and the purpose is to my mind quite plain, that each House, the Senate in its action and the House of Representatives in its action in the matter of regulating the course of procedure, may be left entirely independent of each other. Thus, in the same paragraph, "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members"—"each House shall keep a Journal of its proceedings"—"neither House, during the session of Congress, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days," etc., demonstrates clearly the distinction made by the Constitution as to the two bodies composing Congress, and renders the meaning and application of the words "each House" manifestly plain and certain.

I am well aware, Mr. Speaker, that I argue in the face of the later and generally accepted theory on this question, but I do not stand entirely alone in my view on the subject; and, as I said, the rule which the gentleman from Michigan moves to have stricken out has been recognized by the House of Representatives during many Congresses and been generally accepted until quite recently as embodying the correct principle upon this subject, and that such a rule was binding upon subsequent Congresses until the House took some affirmative action to set it aside.

Mr. HOLMAN. But it never has been so held.

Mr. REILLY. I know it has not been so held lately, and I have already stated that recent decisions have been the other way, but I am not disposed to concede, with all deference to the able and distinguished gentlemen who hold otherwise, that those decisions are correct; and certainly I am not willing at this time to acquiesce in the motion of the gentleman from Michigan, and shall vote against his amendment, as I am in favor of retaining the rule as reported by the committee, believing it to be warranted and lawful. Neither do I believe in the position that the House of Representatives is a mere temporary body. I assert that it is as continual a tribunal as the Senate of the United States. It is true that the personnel of its representatives change every two years in compliance with the constitutional provision creating the Congress of the United States; but still there is never a moment in which there is an interregnum—never a second—in which the legislative body of this country is not in existence, and in which it can not be called together.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. REILLY. Certainly.

Mr. WALKER. I ask the gentleman if he is so sure that his party will be in the minority in the next Congress that he wishes to make the rules for the guidance of that Congress?

Mr. REILLY. I do not deny the right of the next Congress to make its own rules, or to modify the rules made by this House, or to change them or to alter them, or to rescind them altogether, and I am entirely willing that this House shall make rules for the next House, and to take chances as to what the political complexion of that House may be. I simply assert the proposition, that a rule of the House of Represenatives regulating the course of procedure, and made in pursuance of the constitutional grant of authority, is good and binding and continues in force until by some affirmative action on the part of a succeeding House it is rescinded or altered.

But, as I have intimated, Mr. Speaker, I am not entirely without authority that I consider of some weight to sustain me in the position I have taken. Let me give the history of this rule, and by way of further answer to the gentleman from Michigan I invite his attention to this. It was first presented in the form of a standing rule of the House in the first session of the Thirty-sixth Congress by Mr. Washburn of Maine, who, although a member of the Committee on Rules of that Congress, offered it on his own motion by way of amendment to the code of rules reported by that committee:

Mr. WASHBURN of Maine. I now offer the following amendment:
"These rules shall be the rules of the House of Representatives of the present and succeeding Congresses, unless otherwise ordered."
Mr. REAGAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Maine that we can only bind future Congresses by an act of Congress and not by rules.
Mr. WASHBURN of Maine. The House makes its own rules. It has the right and power under the Constitution to do so.
Mr. NOELL. I desire to know of the gentleman from Maine what he intends to do with that provision of the Constitution which gives to "each House" the right to make its own rules of procedure; not that one House shall have a right to make rules for the next House, but that each House shall have a right to make its own rules? I would like to know what he intends to do with that provision of the Constitution?
Mr. GROW. This amendment does not so provide. It does not control the action of any succeeding House in making its rules. They can make them when they please, but until they do make rules these will stand, just as Jefferson's Manual is now regarded as the authority until rules are adopted which interfere with it. The amendment only provides that these shall continue in force until the next House chooses to change them.
Mr. NOELL. The gentleman does not answer my question. My question is what this House has got to do with making rules for the next House?
Mr. GROW. That is just what I am trying to answer.
Mr. NOELL. How can you make rules that will apply to the action of the House not now in existence?
Mr. GROW. We do not make rules for the next House. We only provide that these rules shall continue in force until the next House chooses to change them, and if they choose to sit during the whole session without altering them, then they adopt them as their rules by their own action. The House of Representatives continues under the Constitution without interregnum just as much as the Senate. This idea that there is a period of time when there is no Congress under our Constitution goes on the supposition that there is a period of time when there is no Government. There is a Congress in existence under the Constitution all the time, and when the House meets here the Constitution says they shall select their Speaker. If you have not a House, how are you going to elect a Speaker? They are just as much a House of Representatives under the Constitution the day they meet as they are after they have elected a Speaker. They are not organized under the forms they choose to adopt; that is all. Up to the time when they choose to adopt rules, by their acquiescence in these, they will make them their own rules, so that they will not be left at any time without rules.

And upon a vote by tellers that was adopted. (See Congressional Globe, first session, Thirty-sixth Congress, volume 40, part 2, pages 1211, 1212.)

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the question there being fairly raised, and passed upon by the House, that the action of that House in assenting to the principle and adopting that rule as proposed by Mr. Washburn may be accepted as an expression of the judgment and opinion of that House in favor of the principle I am contending for. The question has been discussed at various times throughout the history of Congress, but as stated in the Digest for the first session of the Fifty-first Congress, page 516, it has been, almost uniformly, decided under the rule (CXLVII) adopted March 19, 1860, that the rules of the preceding House remain in force until otherwise ordered by the succeeding House, until the first session of the Forty-eighth Congress, when Speaker CARLISLE held that the rules of the last House were not in force, and that, until rules were adopted, the House would be governed by the rules and practice of common parliamentary law, which decision. I believe, he reaffirmed in the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses, which was also concurred in by Speaker REED in the Fifty-first Congress, and, as I have already stated, it seems to be now the generally accepted theory. It is not my purpose to enter upon the discussion of these decisions, but I desire simply to submit that they were innovations upon the long-accepted and well-established usages of the House in this particular.

In the Thirty-seventh Congress Speaker Grow made the following statement:

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remark that he will consider the rules of the last House as continuing in force until otherwise ordered. * * *

And we have already seen that Mr. Grow, on the floor of the House, expressed the same view in the remarks above quoted when the amendment of Mr. Washburn was under consideration in the Thirty-sixth Congress, and so late as March 29, 1879, in the first session of the Forty-sixth Congress, when this question was under discussion, we find so high an authority as Speaker Randall practically concurring in this view. In commenting on the ruling of Speaker Grow above quoted (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-sixth Congress, first session, page 110) Mr. Randall made the following statement:

The SPEAKER. Mr. Grow, of course, as Speaker, was also a member of the Committee on Rules, and the Chair is unable to find any decision to the contrary.

And again, page 111, Speaker Randall expressed himself as follows:

That constitutional right is not superseded in any manner by the adoption of the one hundred and forty-seventh rule, because it does not take from the body the right to change its rules at any time.

And again, on the same page, he states:

On that point the Chair desires to say that Rule CXLVII evidently meant this, that instead of entering on the broad sea of parliamentary law, as constructed by various examples in legislative bodies, the House, until it has exercised its constitutional right to make rules, be governed by the rules of the prior House of Congress, instead of entering upon the broad sea of parliamentary practice in the history of legislative bodies.

And again, more significantly, he says, page 112:

The Chair does not construe that the right of the House to make its own rules is superseded at all by the one hundred and forty-seventh rule. The House might just as well resort to the rules of a former House for its guidance as to resort to the general rules of parliamentary practice. That was evidently the purpose of the adoption of the one hundred and forty-seventh rule of March, 1860.

It appears that when Speaker Randall was passing upon this question, he had made an exhaustive and careful examination of rulings upon the question up to that time, and I call special attention to this statement made by him on that occasion, to be found on page 111:

But in the absence of action, the concurrent ruling of the Speakers has indicated that there must be some rules, and it is with that view that Rule CXLVII was adopted and given its scope.

And I am further fortified in my position by having the weight of the opinion of so able and distinguished a statesman as the late President Garfield, who expressed the opinion that even a resolution by a succeeding House adopting the rules of a former House was not necessary on the ground of immemorial usage, and on the occasion above referred to, when a resolution was offerred to adopt the rules of a former House, he expressed his opinion in the following forcible language:

I object to the gentleman's resolution under the existing rules, which are our rules without a declaration of this sort. (See Ibid.)

And Mr. Conger, also a leading member of this House, and afterwards United States Senator, entertained the same opinion upon this subject and sustains the view I have taken as to the construction of the constitutional provision. On this question he expressed himself as follows:

Now, I submit that the phrase "each House" does not mean each renewed House of Representatatives, but the Constitution, referring alike to the two Houses of Congress, provides that each of them may make its own rules independently of the other. This is the great constitutional point, as I take it. * * * Now, if it be true that all the rules of the House of Representatives are vacated upon the termination of the official life of its members, it could be equally said that all rules adopted in the other branch of Congress expire with the change of its members. * * * It happens, however, that the Senate is a continuing body in this sense, that two-thirds of its old members are always understood to continue in office at the opening of each new Congress. Now, the power of this House to make its own rules is conferred upon it as one of the two branches of Congress. The power is not by the language of the Constitution intended to apply specifically to each renewed House of Representatives.

There was perhaps no ruling at that time upon this precise question, but on the occasion referred to, and in the proceedings from which I have quoted, the controversy arose as to a question of order under the provisions of Rule CXX, which was one of the rules of the former Congress, and which at the time had not been adopted by the House then sitting. Still the debate and opinions expressed upon the occasion can be fairly cited as authority in support of my position on this question.

So that, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen I am not entirely without authority, but that, on the contrary, this view of the question was entertained and accepted by the House of Representatives as a correct one for many years, and notwithstanding the eminent authorities which have held the contrary in later years, I still submit the question is an open and debatable one. I still incline to the former rulings and practice as the more correct and founded upon better reason. Ours is a government of law and order, and as I have already stated, there is never a moment when the Congress of the United States as ordained by the Constitution is not in official existence, and may not be called together. I can not assent to the doctrine that the House of Representatives is a mere temporary body.

I took occasion, when the rules of the last Congress were under discussion, in some remarks I then submitted, to show that the first action taken by the first House of Representatives that assembled under our Constitution was to appoint a committee to report a set of rules to regulate its proceedings, and that no business was transacted until that committee reported and a code of rules were adopted, and every succeeding Congress since has adopted and acted under an established code of rules, either by acquiescing in the rules of a former House, or by amending or adding to the same. When the House of Representatives exercises its constitutional power to adopt rules, such action has the highest sanction and sovereignty known to our law, and I submit that when this power is so exercised, this action is not to be blown aside, but stands and must remain in force until rendered nugatory by equally competent authority.

Our Government has had constitutional existence for over a century. Fifty-one Congresses have come and gone and the Fifty-second is now sitting. Is it to be contended that this and every succeeding House of Representatives that assembles here is to be in the same state of chaos and confusion as was the first Congress that assembled? I submit that every House when it assembles here is to be governed by the rules of the former House until in the exercise of its own discretion it chooses to in any manner modify, change, repeal, or rescind such code of rules. I trust, therefore, that the motion of the gentleman from Michigan will not prevail. I am in favor of retaining the rule as it stands, and shall so vote if I am the only member of the House to vote in that way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was disagreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. REILLY. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks upon this subject, if I so desire, in the RECORD.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I have been requested by several gentlemen to make a general request to that effect, which I now make, that gentlemen desiring to print remarks on the subject of the rules may do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi requests permission for members of the House to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CATCHINGS. And that any gentleman who desires to print remarks in the RECORD may do so.

Mr. McMILLIN. On the question of the rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request? There was no objection.

THE RULES.

The Clerk read as follows:

AS TO PRINTING BILLS.

There shall be printed 500 copies of each bill of a public nature, of which 25 shall be deposited in the office of the Clerk of the House, and the remainder shall be deposited in the document room of the House for the use of members; and there shall be printed 100 copies of each private bill, which shall be deposited in the document room of the House for the use of members. Motions to print additional numbers of any bill, report, resolution, or other public document shall be referred to the Committee on Printing; and the report of the committee thereon shall be accompanied by an estimate of the probable cost thereof. Unless ordered by the House no bill, resolution, or other proposition reported by a committee shall be reprinted unless the same be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. McRAE. I offer an amendment to Rule XLVI, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend Rule XLVI by inserting, between the words "nature" and "of," in line 2, the following words: "introduced in the House, or Senate bills when referred to a committee of the House."

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker, the effect of this amendment will be to authorize the printing of Senate bills after they have passed the Senate and come to the House and are referred to a committee for consideration. Under this rule as it now stands we will have no print of Senate bills as they are passed by the Senate. Members who are called upon to consider in committee Senate bills will understand the necessity for having a print of the bill as it comes to them rather than the print as originally introduced in the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman permit me to state that the Senate frequently orders the printing of a bill after it has passed as amended. Suppose he adds to his proposition a proviso in the following words:

Provided it has not been printed by order of the Senate.

Mr. McRAE. I am not familiar with the Senate rules, but I know that the committee upon which I have served heretofore and am now serving has been unable to get prints of the Senate bills referred to it. The Senate orders the printing of House bills when they reach that body, but does not order the printing of Senate bills sent to the House unless by special order. The only print that we will get under the rule as proposed will be as introduced or reported to the Senate. I have no objection to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Indiana. If the Senate should order the printing of any bills after they have passed them, that will be sufficient; but I do not understand that they are interested in printing bills for the House, and I do not believe that the Senate rules provide for any such print.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if his amendment provides for the printing of Senate bills where they are already printed in the Senate.

Mr. McRAE. It only provides for the printing of Senate bills as they pass the Senate, after they have reached the House and been referred to a committee of the House. If a Senate bill is considered and passed when laid before the House by the Speaker, no print is necessary and none is ordered, but if it is referred to a committee for consideration, we have need of a print.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We can get from the document room our proportion of copies of the prints of Senate bills, and I do not see the necessity of again printing the bills here by order of the House, and then having them distributed under our rules, a portion of them going back to the Senate.

Mr. McRAE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that Senate bills are printed after they have passed the Senate?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is not usually done, but when the bills are originally printed we get our quota.

Mr. McRAE. I understand that they are not printed by the Senate after they pass that body unless a motion is made to print them. Is it not better to wait and let them order only such as are referred for consideration?

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman will provide in his amendment something like the following:

Provided the bill has not been printed in the Senate—

Then I can see no objection to it.

Mr. McRAE. Of course there is no use for the rule if the Senate prints the bills, and I have already stated that I have no objection to the amendment you suggest.

Mr. RICHARDSON. They do not print the bill in the form in which it passes the Senate, if it is amended.

Mr. McRAE. If they do not print them there, then in case a bill is amended you can readily see the necessity for the rule.

Mr. HOLMAN. Except where a bill passes the Senate without amendment. They often order a print of a bill which has been amended during its progress through the Senate.

Mr. McRAE. I say again that I have no objection to adding the words suggested, because I only want prints of the bills to be considered, and I do not care whether the Senate prints them or the House; but I know, as a matter of fact, that the officers in the document room are unable to furnish members with prints of Senate bills in the form which they pass the Senate, unless they pass as introduced.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will suggest to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. McRAE] that it will entail a considerable amount of unnecessary printing. It may be that some will be done that ought to be done, but it will necessitate the printing of all those long bridge bills which are printed when first introduced, then frequently printed when they pass the Senate, and then when they come to the House printed again, and when passed and enacted into law printed again.

I suggest to the gentleman that he can accomplish his object, and probably effect the curtailing of unnecessary printing, which the committee is trying to effect and I think has effected thus far, if he will just leave the matter as it is. Then, in the case of any important bill which a committee asks to have printed, the House will unhesitatingly order the printing; but if he does not do that, he will have every long bridge bill that comes over from the Senate to the House printed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And every private bill.

Mr. McRAE. The amendment only refers to public bills.

Mr. McMILLIN. And the appropriation bills—the long appropriation bills—as they come back from the Senate will have to be reprinted. I suggest to him that he will probably reopen a leak which we have now closed up by providing that the papers which accompany executive and other documents shall not be printed except by order of the House. It looks to me, without consultation with my colleagues, that the object of the gentleman can be accomplished by simply asking a print of a bill where he deems it necessary. They introduce and pass their private bills in the Senate by the hundreds and thousands.

Mr. McRAE. But the gentleman should be fair enough, when I make a motion referring to public bills, not to discuss the case of private bills.

Mr. McMILLIN. It had escaped me that it only pertained to public bills; and leaving out the question of fairness, I will say to my friend from Arkansas I could not but be fair to one much less amiable than my friend.

Mr. McRAE. I beg pardon of the gentleman.

Mr. McMILLIN. It had escaped me that it was to be confined to public bills. The great trouble is not escaped by that. I have no interest in the matter except to keep down unnecessary printing.

Mr. McRAE. An attack has been made upon the amendment because it provides for the printing of private bills, when it does not; that it will cause the printing of appropriation bills, when it does not. The Constitution provides that all appropriation bills must originate in the House. They can not, therefore, be Senate bills. This amendment only relates to Senate bills after they have passed the Senate. Our rules provide for the printing of our own bills, I know, but as a matter of fact there is no provision made for the printing of public bills passed by the Senate. I know the necessity for it. We have before the Committee on Public Lands now a number of bills of which we have been unable to get printed copies. Now, why, I ask, are we compelled to ask a special order to print such bills? If the bill is of sufficient importance to receive consideration in the Senate and is passed, it does seem to me that we should print it as we do our own. What is the print for, if not for the committees having them under consideration?

If the original print, of course, is the same, we could have them, but it is not always the case that they are the same. This amendment does not apply to private bills and does not cover appropriation bills. And as a matter of fact it is not intended to cover the bridge bills that pass the Senate, nor is it intended to cover Senate bills that pass the House without reference, but is only intended for those Senate bills which are referred to the committees of the House for consideration.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The difficulty, it strikes me, in this matter is this: We will be providing for the printing of a lot of bills that are not desired if we make a general provision of this kind. There may be instances, and doubtless will be, where there is demand for the reprinting of some particular bill, but that can always be secured on the simple request of a committee or the chairman of a committee.

Now, you take a Senate bill, when it is introduced in the Senate it is printed. The printed bill is sent to the Senate document room and to the House document room for appropriate distribution under the rules. Now, sir, when that bill is reported back to the Senate by a Senate committee, it is again printed as reported by the committee. Thus you have two prints of that Senate bill. Now, the gentleman proposes, when that bill passes the Senate and comes to the House, it shall be again printed, and I undertake to say, that seven times out of ten, and possibly oftener, it will be the identical bill reported from the Senate committee and then printed. We will therefore have three prints here of the Senate bill, and that is a multiplication of prints of bills, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that is altogether superfluous and unnecessary. Therefore I hope my friend will not press the amendment, but will depend on his chance to have any bill printed upon a simple order when necessary, and not have this multiplication of bills at so much cost.

Mr. McRAE. If the Committee on Printing will undertake to see that bills which have been passed by the Senate are allowed to us, or that they are identical with other prints that the Senate has ordered, then there is no necessity for making further provision; but unless some one has charge of that duty the House will have no means of determining whether they are identical. The gentleman says we will be overrun by prints of bills that may come from the Senate. That is assuming that the Senate is going to pass a great many laws, which has not been the case heretofore, and such probably will not be the case now, so far as public bills are concerned.

The Senate prints the House bills when we pass them, and if the House is to properly consider the Senate bills it ought to have a print of them so they can be understood. I can not undertake, for the Committee of Public Lands, to go through every Senate bill that is sent to that committee and compare it with some previous print of the bill to see whether or not any changes have been made. That would be too much labor for any committee, especially those committees that have a large number of such bills to consider. The question is simply whether we shall equip ourselves so as to be able to properly consider and understand just what the Senate has done and what we must act upon by giving to every member of the House, particularly the committees, a correct print of the bill on which we are called upon to vote.

Mr. BLOUNT. When the Senate pass a bill, is the bill reprinted?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No. It comes to us simply in the enrolled form. Nor are our House bills reprinted by us after they have passed the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. Suppose the Senate take up a bill and pass it and send it over here, how is the House to come to a knowledge of it in its perfected form unless the bill is printed as passed?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The bill is sent to the House in the enrolled form, with a certificate that it has passed the Senate in that form, and the enrolled bill is laid before the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. And then the House orders it printed?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then what means have we of knowing just what provisions the bill as passed contains?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is read to the House from the desk.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is there no other way?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is all.

Mr. BLOUNT. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we ought to have a better way than that.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then you will have three reprints of the bill, and——

Mr. BLOUNT. I don't care if it takes forty prints, if they are necessary in order to inform this House of what the bills are.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Not if they are necessary.

Mr. BLOUNT. Well, it seems to me that this is necessary. Suppose the Senate pass a very important bill, the gentleman [Mr. RICHARDSON] informs us that, under the present system, we have no means of knowing just what the bill is in its perfected form except as we may gather it from the reading of the bill from the desk.

Mr. PEEL. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] has spoken of a second print of a Senate bill when the bill has been amended; if it is further amended do we get that in print?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The amendments appear in the RECORD and you get them also in the bill in the enrolled form. I do not undertake to say that in such cases there is not sometimes a reprint by special order. A bill with Senate amendments coming to the House is referred to a committee, and when that committee reports it back it is sometimes ordered to be reprinted.

Mr. PEEL. After it has been twice printed already?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; you can not get a Senate bill here until after it has been twice printed. It is twice printed there; then, if you print it again in the form in which it passes the Senate and it comes here and is referred to one of our committees and is reported back and printed again, that will be the fourth print of the Senate bill. Now, I submit that so many reprints of one bill can not be necessary.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend surely does not intend to count as "reprints" the several prints which are made of a bill the provisions of which are largely different in each case?

Mr. RICHARDSON. If my friend's view is correct, then if you have a bill under consideration here during the day and you amend it and adjourn, you ought to have a new print of it for the next day because you have amended it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Oh, that does not follow. That is rather strained. I like to follow my friend, but I like him to give me good reasons for doing it.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I do not think I have ever seen an instance where an important bill passed this House and went to the Senate and passed that body that it was not printed by the Senate, and we have that Senate print for use in the House. I know that to be the fact from my own experience in many instances.

Mr. McRAE. But, Mr. Speaker, the class of bills to which my friend refers are not involved in this amendment. The Senate orders a print of all House bills, as I stated distinctly, but when the Senate passes a bill and sends it to the House we do not have it printed. That is our business, and not the business of the Senate.

Mr. BLAND. But you have the Senate print of it.

Mr. McRAE. Not as the bill passes the Senate. When the Senate passes a bill they send us the enrolled copy and nothing else, and if we want the bill printed in the form in which it has passed the Senate we must order it done ourselves. We can get the original Senate print and nothing else. It is no longer before that body. It becomes finished work as far as they are concerned.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. McREA; and the Speaker pro tempore declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. McRAE. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to Rule XLVI, which relates merely to the distribution of the documents for which the rule provides.

The amendment was read, as follows:

There shall be printed 500 copies of each bill of a public nature, of which 25 shall be deposited in the office of the Clerk of the House, 100 copies shall be delivered to the Senate document room, and the remainder shall be deposited in the document room of the House for the use of members; and there shall be printed 100 copies of each private bill and bills relating to rivers and harbors, of which 25 copies shall be delivered to the Senate document room and the remainder shall be deposited in the document room of the House for the use of members. Motions to print additional numbers of any bill, report, resolution, or other public document shall be referred to the Committee on Printing; and the report of the committee thereon shall be accompanied by an estimate of the probable cost thereof. Unless ordered by the House no bill, resolution, or other proposition reported by a committee shall be reprinted unless the same be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. McCREARY. Does the amendment change the number?

Mr. RICHARDSON. It does not. In the rule as reported there is no provision for sending any number of the public House bills to the Senate document room, and the amendment provides for that. In the last three Congresses this number, 100, has been supplied to the Senate document room, but it has been done under a special order by the Speaker, and my amendment is intended to obviate the necessity for such a special order. The other part of the amendment provides for sending 25 copies of each private bill and each river and harbor bill to the Senate document room.

Mr. HARRIES. Will the gentleman state whether there is anything in the rule which would prevent any one member from taking all the printed copies of a private bill, leaving none for anybody else?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; there is nothing in the rule to prevent it.

Mr. HARRIES. So that when the bill comes up for consideration and other members send for copies they may be unable to get them, the one member having distributed the whole number among his constituents.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Oh, there is nothing in the rule to prevent that, but the clerk in charge of the document room would probably prevent it. He would not be likely to allow any one member to take all the copies of a bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. As a matter of fact the clerk in charge of the bills restricts the number that any one member can receive.

Mr. RICHARDSON. This amendment is not intended to reach the matter suggested by the gentleman from Georgia, but simply to secure a proper distribution of the bills which we provide shall be printed under this rule.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing [Mr. RICHARDSON] whether it would not be well to insert in this rule a provision that there be retained in the document room a sufficient number or some designated number of every printed bill for the use of the committee to which the bill has been referred.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Practically this accomplishes that result; for after 100 copies of every public bill and 25 copies of every private bill have been sent to the Senate document room, all of the residue are retained in our document room for the use of individual members and of the committees.

Mr. BLOUNT. But I understood the gentleman to state a few moments ago that the bills thus retained might be taken out by members. The effect of the amendment is to reduce to the extent of 100 the number of every public bill accessible to us, and to the extent of 25 the number of every private bill. Now, the gentleman knows as well as I do that in many cases members who introduce bills here—for instance, pension bills—desire a great many copies to send them to different parts of the country. This being the case, might it not happen that a committee taking up for consideration an important matter referred to it might send to the document room for printed copies of the bill and there would be none there? Might it not be well to provide against such a difficulty, and make sure that there shall be a sufficient number of every printed bill for the use of the committee to which it is referred? I do not wish to offer any amendment, but I submit the suggestion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would not object to an amendment requiring the superintendent of the document room to retain a certain number of every printed bill for the use of the committee having the bill in charge. But I can not see how any difficulty can arise in that respect, because the clerk in charge of the bills always lays aside a certain number of copies of each bill for specific purposes—so many more for the committees——

Mr. BLOUNT. Does not the gentleman know that in many cases we have been obliged to order the reprinting of bills because all the printed copies have been exhausted?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That occurs occasionally; but in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred no reprint is necessary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee is exhausted.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask a vote on my amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. RICHARDSON, it was agreed to.

The Clerk read the last paragraph of the proposed rules, as follows:

RULE XLVII.

PROPOSITIONS INTRODUCED "BY REQUEST."

When a bill, resolution, or memorial is introduced "by request" these words shall be entered upon the Journal.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I ask unanimous consent to recur to Rule XXII, in order that the title may be so amended as to conform to the amendments which have been made in the body of the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment suggested, after which the Chair will ask if there is objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the title of Rule XXII by striking out the word "and" and adding "bills and resolutions."

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the amendment of Mr. CATCHINGS; and it was agreed to.

Mr. REED. I desire to offer a substitute. I believe the report of the committee has been finished.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman offer this in lieu of the substitute already pending?

Mr. REED. I have just come into the Hall, and perhaps misunderstand the existing state of affairs; but I supposed the consideration of the rules as reported had been finished, and I was proposing to offer a substitute for the whole of them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The consideration of the proposed rules as reported has been concluded; but the Chair understands that the substitute offered by the minority of the committee at the time the consideration of these rules was entered upon is pending.

Mr. REED. That is the same I desire now to offer. I propose as a substitute the rules of the Fifty-first Congress, with some amendment, making them more stringent and more useful.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the gentleman's proposition.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. REED offers as a substitute the rules of the House of the Fifty-first Congress, with this amendment: Amend Rule VIII by inserting, after clause 1, the following:

"Whenever on any question a quorum is found not to be present there shall be a call of the House, and the yeas and nays on the pending question shall at the same time be ordered. The Clerk shall call the roll, and each member as he answers to his name, or is brought before the House under the proceedings of a call of the House, shall vote on the pending question. If those voting on the question and those who are present and decline to vote, shall together make a majority of the House, the Speaker shall declare that a quorum is constituted; and the pending question shall be decided as those voting shall appear."

Mr. REED. I merely desire to say that I offer on behalf of the Republican minority of this House the same rules which governed the House of Representatives of the Fifty-first Congress, when the Republicans were in a majority. My proposition includes a single amendment to those rules for the purpose of making effectual the rule for obtaining a quorum when a quorum is absent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move the previous question on the adoption of the rules as amended and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken on the substitute proposed by Mr. REED, it was rejected.

The report of the Committee on Rules as amended was then adopted.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I offer the resolution I send to the desk in this connection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the code of rules just adopted be printed, and that 1,000 additional copies be printed and delivered to the Clerk of the House.

The resolution was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CAMINETTI. I ask unanimous consent to introduce for reference at this time a bill.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, under the rules just adopted the gentleman has a right to refer his bill through the box.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If it is a bill, the gentleman can introduce it now under the rule without calling it to the attention of the House.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to have printed all documents for the use of said committee that they may deem necessary in connection with subjects referred to that committee.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SAYERS. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back an urgent deficiency bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5399) making appropriations to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the expenses of the Eleventh Census, and for other purposes.

The bill was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. McMILLIN. All points of order are reserved.

INVESTIGATION OF THE WORLD'S COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

Mr. SAYERS. I am further instructed by the committee to report back a resolution regarding an inquiry concerning the World's Fair, with a substitute. I desire to say in this connection that I shall ask the House to-morrow morning to consider first the deficiency bill and then the substitute for the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What disposition does the gentleman now desire made of the resolution?

Mr. SAYERS. I ask that it be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest to my friend from Texas that he ask consent that both reports, that on the bill and the substitute offered by the committee, be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SAYERS. At the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution, together with the report on the bill and on the resolution, be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. McCREARY. What is the bill and to what resolution is the reference made?

Mr. SAYERS. The resolution has reference to the appointment of a committee to inquire into the condition of the World's Fair and the bill is an appropriation for the census.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution is reported with a substitute, and the gentleman gives notice that he will call up the resolution to-morrow morning after having disposed of the urgent deficiency bill. Is there objection to printing both reports in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

The report on the deficiency bill is as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations report herewith and recommend the passage of a bill appropriating $200,000 for continuing the work of the Eleventh Census and $3,000 to pay the salary of the superintendent of free delivery in the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General during the fiscal year 1892.

The report accompanying the resolution of inquiry is as follows:

INQUIRY CONCERNING WORLD'S FAIR.

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the resolution asking for information touching the management of the World's Fair and expenditures therefor, having considered the same, report herewith and recommend the adoption of the accompanying substitute therefor.

The original resolution of Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa is as follows:

Whereas Congress, by act approved April 25, 1890, provided for holding an International Exposition of the progress made in civilization, at the city of Chicago, in 1893, to commemorate the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Columbus; and

Whereas the act designating Chicago as the site of said Exposition required the people of that city to provide a suitable site and $10,000,000 to complete the appropriation for holding said Exposition; and

Whereas, in response to the requirements of said act, the citizens of Chicago have furnished a site and provided over $10,000,000, a sum deemed adequate by Congress; and

Whereas fifty-nine nations have accepted the invitation of the Government of the United States to be present and participate in said Exposition, and fifty States and Territories of the Federal Union have indicated their intention to participate, and have expressed their desire that said exhibition shall in all things be commensurate with the importance of the event to be celebrated, and be worthy of the wealth and character of the United States; and

Therefore, in order that Congress may be fully advised as to the scope and plan adopted by those having jurisdiction and management of said Exposition, and also concerning the progress made, the amount of money expended, the manner of such expenditures, and the necessity therefor, together with such further information concerning the amount available for said work and the sum that may become necessary to complete the same and prepare the Exposition for opening its gates to visitors:

Be it resolved, That an inquiry be, and is hereby, ordered to ascertain whether those obligated and undertaking to do so have justly and properly complied with the requirements of the said act of Congress approved April 25, 1890, and the subsequent appropriations made for said Exposition; whether the money provided has been judiciously expended; whether the number of employés and appointees to carry out and into effect the laws is excessive, and their compensation reasonable or otherwise, and to ascertain and report the salary or compensation paid to each officer and employé; from what States the several appointments have been made, and generally whether, in the care and conduct of the Exposition, proper management has been had; and that a full report of those in charge of the expenditure of money be made of all such expenditures, and that copies of the monthly pay rolls of all officers and appointees be transmitted to Congress for its full information; and that the report based upon said inquiry may be made at any time to Congress, but at the earliest day possible, consistent with the necessities of the inquiries involved in this resolution.

The substitute proposed by the Committee on Appropriations is as follows:

Resolution of inquiry concerning the management of the World's Fair and expenditures therefor.

Whereas Congress by act approved April 25, 1890, provided for holding an International Exposition of the progress made in civilization, at the city of Chicago in 1893, to commemorate the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Columbus; and

Whereas the act designating Chicago as the site of said Exposition required the people of that city to provide a suitable site and $10,000,000 to complete the appropriation for holding said Exposition; and

Whereas fifty-nine nations have accepted the invitation of the Government of the United States to be present and participate in said Exposition, and fifty States and Territories of the Federal Union have indicated their intention to participate and have expressed their desire that said exhibition shall in all things be commensurate with the importance of the event to be celebrated and be worthy of the wealth and character of the United States; and

Whereas the Government has absolutely appropriated the sum of $1,088,000, and estimates are now before the Committee on Appropriations asking for further appropriations: Therefore, in order that Congress may be fully advised as to the scope and plan adopted by those having jurisdiction and management of said Exposition, and also concerning the progress made, the amount of money expended, the manner of such expenditures, and the necessity therefor, together with such further information concerning the amount available for said work, and the sum that may become necessary to complete the same, and prepare the Exposition for opening its gates to visitors,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations is hereby ordered to inquire and report to this House whether those obligated and undertaking, and now engaged to do so, have justly and properly complied with the requirements of the said act of Congress approved April 25, 1890, and whether all expenditures of whatever character for said exposition have been judiciously made; whether the number of employés and appointees to carry out and into effect the laws is excessive and their compensation reasonable or otherwise, and to ascertain and report the salary or compensation paid to each officer and employé, from what States the several appointments have been made, and generally whether, in the care and conduct of said exposition, proper management has been had; that they obtain a full report, of those in charge of the expenditure of money, of all such expenditures, together with copies of the monthly pay rolls of all officers and appointees, and that the report of the committee, based upon said inquiry, may be made at any time to Congress, but at the earliest day possible, consistent with the necessities of the inquires involved in this resolution; and that the expenses of the committee or of any subcommittee it may designate to prosecute these inquiries and examination shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, and the chairman of said committee or of such subcommittee, if one be designated, is authorized to draw for the same on the Clerk of the House in sums not to exceed $500 at any one time.

Mr. McCREARY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McCREARY. I heard a statement by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] with regard to a report made by the Committee on Appropriations concerning an investigation of the World's Fair, but the gentleman was so near the Clerk's desk that I was unable to hear precisely what occurred. I left my seat and came into this part of the Hall, and I ask the Speaker now to state what has been done with regard to this very important proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state, and asks the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], in reply to the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Kentucky, that the gentleman from Texas, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back a resolution of inquiry offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], with a substitute, and unanimous consent was asked that the report and the substitute be printed in the RECORD; and also gave notice, the former request having been complied with, that after the disposition of the urgent deficiency bill reported by him to-day he would call up the resolution of inquiry.

Mr. McCREARY. When will it be called up; to-morrow?

Mr. SAYERS. To-morrow, probably.

Mr. McCREARY. Then I suggest, as the chairman of the Committee on the Columbian Exposition, Mr. DURBOROW, has a substitute for the report of the Committee on Appropriations to offer, that he be allowed to have that published also.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The substitute to be offered by Mr. DURBOROW, from the Committee on the Columbian Exposition, is as follows:

Whereas Congress by an act approved April 25, 1890, provided "for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus by holding an international exhibition of arts, industries, manufactures, and the products of the soil, mine, and sea, in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois;"

Whereas according to the requirements of said act, the citizens of Chicago have furnished a site and provided about $10,000,000 in aid of said international exhibition;

Whereas thirty-nine nations and twenty-four colonies have accepted the invitation of the Government of the United States to be present and participate in said exhibition, and their appropriations made or officially proposed, amount to $4,004,505, and twenty-six States and two Territories have made appropriations for representation at the exhibition, amounting to $2,695,000, and the Government of the United States has appropriated the sum of $1,088,000 and directed the Secretary of the Treasury to cause a suitable building to be erected on the site selected for the World's Columbian Exposition, for the purpose of exhibiting from its Executive Departments, the Smithsonian Institution, the United States Fish Commission, and the National Museum such articles and materials as illustrate the function and administrative faculty of the Government in time of peace and its resources as a war power and which tend to demonstrate the nature of our institutions and their adaptation to the wants of the people; and

Whereas officers of the World's Columbian Exposition have been before the Committee on the Columbian Exposition asking for further appropriations: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Columbian Exposition is hereby ordered to ascertain and report whether the said act of Congress, approved April 25, 1890, is being complied with, and whether subsequent appropriations made for said Exposition are being judiciously expended, and whether the officers and employés are being properly and reasonably paid, and what amount of money has been expended by the United States Government, and the manner and necessity of such expenditure, and what additional amount, if any, is necessary to be expended, and what further legislation, if any, is necessary, and all other facts that may conduce to the protection and benefit of the Government of the United States and the success of the Columbian Exposition; and in order to make such report the committee is authorized to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and to present its report to the House of Representatives for consideration at any time.

WORLD'S COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

Mr. DICKERSON. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Whether consent was given to the gentleman from Texas to call up the World's Fair resolution, or did he just give notice that he would call it up?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He gave notice that he would call it up after the disposition of the urgent deficiency bill, and consent was given to print the report in the RECORD. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DICKERSON] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will now report, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

The resolution requesting the Committee on the Judiciary to investigate and report to the House whether Congress has the Constitutional authority to appropriate money to the Columbian Exposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky. The Chair hears none. The question is now on concurring in the resolution. As many as are in favor will say ay.

Mr. BLAND. Let us have the resolution read. It has only been reported by title, but the resolution itself has not been read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That, in view of the fact that the Fifty-second Congress will be asked to appropriate a large sum of money for the World's Columbian Exposition, the Committee on the Judiciary be and is hereby requested to make an investigation of the law bearing upon the subject, and report to the House whether Congress has the constitutional authority to appropriate money for such purposes.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inquire of the Chair whether under the rules of the House just adopted that resolution would not be properly referable to the Committee on the Columbian Exposition?

Mr. DICKERSON. I did not ask for reference, but I asked for immediate consideration, and consent was given.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent was given for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. REILLY. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Columbian Exposition. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky by striking out the word "Judiciary" and substituting the words "Columbian Exposition."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DICKERSON] moves to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DICKERSON. That was not my motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will be in order, and the Chair will state the parliamentary situation. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DICKERSON] moves to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary. To that motion the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. REILLY] offers an amendment, referring it to the Committee on the World's Columbian Exposition.

Mr. DICKERSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. The Committee on the Judiciary does not, under the rule, as I understand it, have jurisdiction of the question.

Mr. OWENS. Not necessarily.

Mr. DICKERSON. Under the rules?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is a question the House ought to consider.

Mr. DICKERSON. I understand that, but under the rule it would not go to that committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The opinion of the Chair is that the resolution, in the absence of any motion, would go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MCKENNA. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MCKENNA. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A resolution has been offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DICKERSON] requesting the opinion of the Judiciary Committee as to the constitutional power of Congress to make an appropriation for the World's Columbian Exposition. Unanimous consent was given for the present consideration of the resolution. The gentleman from Kentucky moves the reference of that resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary. The gentleman from Pennsylennia [Mr. REILLY] offers an amendment, to refer the resolution to the Committee on the World's Columbian Exposition.

Mr. DICKERSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that I did not make that motion.

Mr. MCKENNA. In the confusion which prevailed on the floor we did not hear the request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was given after an opportunity for objection.

Mr. MCKENNA. I was paying strict attention, as I was somewhat interested in the matter, and I would certainly have objected to it.

Mr. DICKERSON. The request which I made—and I wish to correct the Speaker—was not that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, but I asked unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, and that was granted after the Chair had stated my request in a very audible tone of voice, and after opportunity was given for any gentleman to interpose objection. The gentleman from Pennsylvania now wishes to amend by moving a reference to the Committee on the World's Columbian Exposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky is right. The Chair misunderstood the gentleman, and is in error in stating the parliamentary situation. The gentleman did not make the motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DICKERSON. I submit that no amendment is in order to that. I made no motion to refer. I simply ask for immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct in the statement that he did not move to refer the resolution, but asked consideration.

Mr. REILLY. I move to substitute the words "Columbian Exposition" in place of the word "Judiciary," my motion being to strike out the word "Judiciary" and substitute the words "Columbian Exposition."

Mr. DICKERSON. Why do you want a question of law to go to that committee? That is a legal question.

Mr. OATES. Let us have the resolution reported again. There was so much confusion that many of us did not hear it.

The resolution was again reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the resolution pending.

Mr. OATES. The motion, as I understand it now, is to strike out "Judiciary" and substitute "World's Columbian Exposition."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. REILLY].

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word upon that. I am a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, and I am not hankering after the work of giving an opinion upon this subject; but if an opinion is to be had on the power to make such an appropriation as that, it is purely a legal question, and ought to go to that committee, which is constituted by this House for the purpose of settling the legal status of a legal question involved so far as a committee can do it. If the House wants such an opinion from any committee, this being a legal question entirely that is involved, it ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DICKERSON. I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. REILLY. One moment.

Mr. DICKERSON. I yield a moment to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Kentucky withdraw the demand for the previous question?

Mr. DICKERSON. I do for the present.

Mr. REILLY. In view of the statement of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES], who is a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, thinking that perhaps his view is correct, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BYNUM. We can not hear what is going on in front.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlemen in front of the Chair will please be seated. No business will be transacted until the House is in order.

Mr. DICKERSON. I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. REILLY. I withdraw the amendment on the statement made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES].

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. DICKERSON, the motion to reconsider the last vote was laid upon the table.

JAMES A. DAVIS.

Mr. MCKINNEY. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions to report back the bill (H. R. 4488) granting a pension to James A. Davis as being improperly referred, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SPRINGER. These reports can now be made through the petition box, and I suggest that the practice may as well be commenced now with reference to these bills that have been improperly referred. Committees can return them to the Clerk's desk, and the reference can there be corrected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do not object; but we may as well begin and establish this practice correctly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the change of reference recommended in this case will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Pending the motion to adjourn—

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WARWICK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. 217) to amend an act entitled "An act for the construction of a railroad and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River at South St. Paul, Minn.," approved April 26, 1890; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. TURPIN, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. DANIELL (at the request of Mr. MCKINNEY), for five days, on account of important business.

The motion to adjourn was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 9 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

IRRIGATION OF ARID LANDS.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the resolutions and memorial of the irrigation congress, which was held in Salt Lake City, Utah, in September, 1891, in favor of granting in trust all public lands except mineral lands to the several States and Territories wherein situate, for the purpose of developing irrigation. That was a very important congress, in which delegates representing ten States and two Territories took part, and I am authorized by the Select Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands to ask consent that they be printed in the RECORD, in view of the importance of the subject-matter therein contained.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] that these resolutions and memorial be printed in the RECORD?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The resolutions and memorial are as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists respectfully represent: That in pursuance of a call issued by the Hon. Arthur L. Thomas, governor of Utah, for a convention "to consider matters pertaining to the reclamation of the arid public lands of the West," the irrigation congress met at Salt Lake City on September 15, 1891, and remained in session for three days. There were delegates in attendance from the States of California, Colorado, Idaho, Kansas, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, Oregon, Texas, and Wyoming, and the Territories of Utah and New Mexico, and the body was in a notable degree representative of that large section of the Union in which the rainfall is inadequate for the purposes of agriculture.

The sense of the congress was embodied in the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this congress is in favor of granting in trust, upon such conditions as shall serve the public interest, to the States and Territories needful of irrigation, all lands now a part of the public domain within such States and Territories, excepting mineral lands, for the purpose of developing irrigation and to render lands now arid fertile and capable of supporting a population.

Resolved, That it is the sense of this convention that the committee selected to prepare and present to Congress the memorial of this convention respecting public lands, should ask as a preliminary to the cession of all the land in the Territories in accordance with the resolutions of the convention, a liberal grant to said Territories and to the States to be formed therefrom, of the public lands to be devoted to public school purposes.

Whereas large areas of arid lands and semiarid lands, situated upon the great plains of the Dakotas, Western Nebraska, Kansas, and Oklahoma were settled upon in good faith, by homeseekers, under the supposition that they were entering agricultural lands, and

Whereas the settlers upon such lands have expended much time and labor upon the same; and paid into the United States Treasury therefor many millions of dollars, only to discover that irrigation, to a greater or less extent, is necessary in making homes for themselves thereon: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the representatives of all the States and Territories directly concerned in irrigation do hereby pledge their unwavering support to the just demands of such settlers that the General Government shall donate at least a portion of the funds received from the sale of such lands toward the procurement of the means necessary for their irrigation.

Resolved, That this congress heartily indorse the irrigation work of the Agricultural Department of the National Government in the collection and dissemination of information, especially its admirable progress reports covering the whole field of irrigation development, and that it favors large appropriations for this work hereafter.

It is submitted that the considerations in support of the request expressed in the first of the above resolutions are of a very cogent character. It is undeniably true that the General Government has nearly reached the limit of its capacity to provide homes for settlers upon the public domain. The tracts now remaining are almost wholly such as can not be sold or otherwise disposed of under the liberal provisions of our land laws. Referring to the area embraced in the terms of the resolution, the condition is found to be that lands susceptible of irrigation at a practicable cost are occupied, and that those which are still subject to entry can only be fitted for cultivation by systems of canals, reservoirs, or artesian wells involving expenditures quite beyond the resources of individual settlers.

The topography and other physical conditions that must be overcome in the work of utilizing water for the purposes of agriculture are not widely understood. The ultimate sources of the streams that provide the only available water supply are the snows that are deposited on the mountain tops and in the deep recesses of the cañons. In the spring these snows melt rapidly and form raging torrents that cut deep channels in their pathway. Thus when they enter the valley they are far below the level of the lands which they are to reclaim. This condition renders it necessary to fix the point of diversion far up the cañon upon the rocky mountain sides, and to construct long canals and flumes to conduct the water at the required height to be delivered upon the successive benches that lie below.

The waste of water before the season of irrigation commences is another potent factor of expense. In the spring the flow of water is the largest, for obvious reasons, and then vast volumes run to waste. Later the supply decreases, and is the least when most needed for the nourishment of growing crops. To prevent this the only efficient remedy is to impound the water in large storage reservoirs, which can only be constructed at an enormous cost.

It is not to be assumed that because the reclamation of the arid region involves the expenditure of vast sums of money it is therefore impracticable. On the contrary, it can be fully justified as a business enterprise. Compare the yield in agricultural products of lands cultivated with the aid of irrigation with the yield of lands that are watered by the natural rainfall, and the difference will be found to be from 50 to 100 per cent in favor of the former. Land that is now wholly unproductive, upon being provided with facilities for irrigation, immediately attains a value of from $10 to $50 an acre, the difference being due to location, accessibility to markets, and other manifest conditions. It may be questioned whether the country affords a more inviting field for the investment of capital than that which is here presented.

We feel warranted in assuming that the General Government will pursue no policy respecting the arid lands of the public domain that will not assist in their reclamation and the development of their possibilities in affording homes to settlers, increasing the food supply of the people, and contributing to the general wealth. The question remains whether Congress will undertake the work by direct appropriations from the Treasury sufficient for the prompt construction of the required systems of irrigation. There has been some agitation of the subject for several years past without further results than the appropriation of $350,000 and its expenditure in topographical surveys. It is not manifest that these have materially advanced the solution of the practical problems of irrigation; at all events the rate of progress forbids the hope of any substantial results within a reasonable period. So far as we can infer the disposition of the General Government from its previous action, the answer to the above question must be in the negative.

Neither is it certain that it would be practicable for Congress to pass a general law that would operate justly and efficiently upon all parts of the arid belt. Wyoming differs in both from Montana and Idaho, and Colorado from Utah and New Mexico; yet it is of primary importance that legislation designed to promote the reclamation of these lands should recognize and adjust itself to all these differences.

The only alternative course seems to be that which is recommended in the resolutions of the congress, viz: "the granting in trust, upon such conditions as shall serve the public interest, to the States and Territories needful of irrigation, all lands now o part of the public domain within such States and Territories, excepting mineral lands, for the purpose of developing irrigation, to render lands now arid fertile and capable of supporting a population." We feel assured that such action would be promptly followed by the inauguration and vigorous prosecution of enterprises for the reclamation of those lands, either by the States and Territories themselves or through the agency of municipalities erected for the purpose, with power to borrow money upon the security of the reclaimed lands.

A precedent for the policy proposed is not wanting. Congress ceded to the States in the Mississippi Valley and other sections of the Union the swamp lands within their respective limits. The purpose of this action was to insure their reclamation, and it found its support in the knowledge that a considerable expense would be involved in fitting them for cultivation. Such is the condition of the arid lands, with this difference, that the problem of reclamation is infinitely more difficult than that of draining the swamp lands, and also that the swamp lands in any one State were of comparatively little value and of so slight concern to the public that they were liable to maladministration; whereas in the case of the arid lands, as soon as they come under the control of the State they will at once become the most prominent question in State politics and of so great and immediate interest to its citizens that their administration will be conducted under the surveillance of a deeply concerned people, who will permit no chicanery. In principle the cession of the swamp lands to the States affords a perfect precedent for such action as we are seeking at the hands of your honorable body.

The importance of our pastoral interests makes it necessary that provision be made for the protection and utilization of the grazing land in connection with the contiguous irrigable areas. To the grazing lands, as distinguished from the agricultural lands, belong those vast areas of elevated table and bench lands and the high, rolling divides which lie upon the summits and along the slopes of the watersheds, and they comprise three-fourths of the arid domain. They never can be made the self-supporting habitation of man, because they are too elevated and too vast in extent to be irrigated; but they furnish a valuable complement to the lands reclaimed, the first supplying the summer's and the second the winter's food supply.

Adequate provision for securing possession or managment of these lands to the settler, for the sole purpose to which they are adapted, has never been attempted by Congress; and the question is of such magnitude and importance in connection with the subject of farming by irrigation in the region where grazing lands abound, that a great impetus will be given to irrigation if such States as may see fit to adopt that policy are placed in a position to encourage settlement by attaching to the land capable of being claimed a larger contiguous tract of grazing land. It will make more valuable the irrigable areas and supply the settler with an important source of income by adding the business of stock-raising to that of the farmer.

No mention is made in the resolutions of the congress of the preservation of the forests, but the subject is too intimately associated with that of irrigation to be divorced. The coniferous trees, such as constitute the timber growth on the mountains and elevated plateaus of the West, are exceedingly inflammable, and when once fire is communicated to them a vast destruction of values ensues. The loss from this cause, measured by the stumpage value of the timber alone, may be estimated without extravagance at $100,000,000 per year. The Federal Government has made some efforts to arrest this destruction, but wholly without success.

It is from the States or local agencies created by the States that protection must be sought. To the settlers the preservation of the forests is a matter of grave importance. They are dependent upon them for fuel, fencing, and building materials; but this is by no means the limit of their interest. The forests on the mountain tops are the chief conservators of the waters that are to irrigate the valleys below. With their destruction fhe reclamation of the arid lands ceases to be a problem and becomes an impossibility. An efficient and just system of preserving the forests from destruction by fire and applying them under proper restrictions to the use of settlers can not be otherwise provided and administered than by the States.

The second of the above resolutions addresses itself to a subject that can not fail to commend itself to your favorable consideration. It is inconceivable that Congress will make any disposition of the public domain without first securing to the Territories their endowment for the support of public schools. The arbitrary selection by law of the sections dedicated to this purpose operates as a gross injustice to the Territories in the arid region. By far the greater number of the school sections are located upon mountain tops or other places where they can not be cultivated, and it follows that nothing can be realized from their sale. The liberal policies of the Government, dating from the passage of the great ordinance of 1787, in all that pertains to the education of our youth forbids the thought that any discrimination will be exercised against the newer portions of the Union, or that they shall be less than equal sharers of its bounty. The petition embodied in the resolution is simply an appeal for justice.

The condition of settlers on lands within the semiarid belt was felt to call urgently for relief at your hands. Thousands of people have settled within this area in reliance upon the assurance officially extended by the Government that they were "agricultural," which was naturally presumed to mean that they were capable of producing crops by the usual methods of agriculture. They have found that the rainfall is highly uncertain in quantity and seasonableness, and that year after year the labors which they have bestowed upon their fields have been expended in vain. The consequences have been most deplorable. Without fault on their own part, acting only upon the impulse that has been the chief factor in expanding the domain of civilization, they now find themselves and their families confronted with actual destitution. The Government sold to them the lands that they occupy at no less prices and upon no other terms than such as obtained in more favored localities; and it has received into its Treasury not less than $12,000,000 as the purchase price. We submit that the circumstances eloquently support their prayer for relief, and that the Government may most properly dedicate a portion of the money which they have themselves contributed to the work of developing and applying the water supply in such a manner as to make these habitable and productive.

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray, etc.

Of committee on memorial: Alex. C. Botkin, chairman, representing Montana; A. D. Foote, secretary, representing Idaho; J. H. Abbott, representing Nebraska; Frank Bond, representing Wyoming; J. H. Hamilton, representing Oregon; C. W. Irish, representing Nevada; Platt Rodgers, representing Colorado; J. H. Thomas, representing Washington; D. H. Wenger, representing New Mexico; C. C. PROHIBITION OF POLYGAMY.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution (H. Res. 77) introduced by me the other day, relating to an amendment to the Constitution for the prohibition of polygamy in the United States, be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The joint resolution is as follows:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting polygamy within the United States, and all places subject to their jurisdiction, to be known as the sixteenth amendment.

Whereas the Territory of Utah has asked to be admitted into the Union as a State, with a constitution prohibiting polygamy, and Congress has heretofore refused such request, on the ground that after such admission she might change her constitution and permit polygamy, and that then there would be left in Congress no constitutional power to deal with that question; and

Whereas said Territory has for twenty years had a larger population than the State of Wyoming, admitted by the last Congress, has now; and

Whereas said Territory now has a larger population than the three adjoining States of Wyoming, Idaho, and Nevada combined, and a larger population than either of six States already in the Union; and

Whereas the President, in his last annual message to Congress, substantially recommends that this Territory should still be kept out of the Union until we have "satisfactory evidence" that after admission they would "make, enforce, and maintain" effective laws against polygamy, because as a Territory the laws of Congress can reach and punish polygamy there, while as a State they could not so do; and

Whereas under such a rule and all the circumstances and possible contingencies it is difficult to determine what would be such "satisfactory evidence," or whether the time for the admission of said Territory into the Union would ever arrive; and

Whereas an amendment to the Constitution forever prohibiting polygamy in the United States, and empowering Congress to enforce it, would leave no longer any reason or excuse for refusing statehood to this great Territory; and

Whereas such an amendment would, besides, guard the small States adjoining Utah against an inundation from its polygamous minority, who may thus now easily gain control of one or more of them, and so change their constitutions and laws as to sanction and legalize polygamy there beyond the power of the General Government under our present Constitution to gainsay, deny, or in any manner interfere with; and

Whereas it would seem the part of wisdom to effectually and finally dispose of polygamy now, while yet it may be easily done: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That this Fifty-second Congress hereby proposes to the Legislatures of the several States the following amendment to the Constitution of these United States, to be known as article 16 of the amendments thereto, to wit:

"ARTICLE XVI.

"SECTION 1. Polygamy shall never exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

"SEC. 2. Congress shall have power to make all needful laws to enforce this article and punish its violation."

Upon the adoption of this resolution the President shall cause the same to be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States, as soon as may be, for their ratification or rejection: and if ratified by three-fourths of such Legislatures, the same shall be of full force and effect, and the President shall make due proclamation thereof.

TO PUT AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS ON THE FREE LIST.

Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a joint resolution in relation to the revenue, proposing to place agricultural implements on the free list, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman can not introduce it in this way at this time. It must be handed to the Speaker for reference.

Mr. FITHIAN. Well, I will present it to the Speaker now for reference, and afterwards I will ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Very well.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The committees will now be called for reports, and, with the permission of the House, the Clerk will call the list for the Speaker.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Can any but reports on private bills be made to-day?

The SPEAKER. Reports on private bills are not made publicly; they are made privately.

Mr. CULBERSON. Then can reports upon public bills be made to-day?

The SPEAKER. Yes. No other reports than reports upon public bills are in order. Reports on private bills are to be handed to the Clerk.

WAR CLAIMS FOR OCCUPATION OF CHURCH AND SCHOOL BUILDINGS, ETC.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I handed to the Clerk a report from the Committee on War Claims upon the bill (H. R. 639) to authorize the Secretary of War to cause to be investigated and to provide for the payment of all claims for the use and occupation of church and school buildings and grounds for Government purposes by the United States military authorities during the late war, and all claims for damages resulting from the appropriation to Government use of any of the furnishings or materials in said class of buildings. That bill has been referred, I find, to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. If it properly belongs to the Private Calendar, the reference should be changed; on the other hand, if it is a public bill, it should under the rules be reported at this time. I would be glad to have the Chair decide whether the bill properly belongs on the Union Calendar or the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN). Under the rule, public bills are required to be reported in open House. So far as the Chair can judge from the title of this bill, the bill itself not being before him, it belongs to the class which should be reported in open House.

Mr. ENLOE. Then I desire to report it at this time and have it placed on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will send up the bill.

Mr. ENLOE. The bill and report are already in possession of the Clerk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The order requested by the gentleman will be made.

The bill referred to, reported from the Committee on War Claims without amendment, was accordingly referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SARATOGA MONUMENT.

By Mr. CUMMINGS, favorably, from the Committee on the Library: A bill (H. R. 302) to appropriate $18,484.57 for the completion and dedication of the monument commemoratiug the surrender of Burgoyne at Saratoga—to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

There was no objection.

The committee report the bill back adversely, with the recommendation that it lie upon the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. OATES. I do not know whether the provision requiring the printing of adverse reports is retained in the present rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not remember, but will have the correct order made with regard to this report.

LINEAL PROMOTION IN THE ARMY.

NATIONAL SAFE DEPOSIT COMPANY, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. HEMPHILL also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back the bill (H. R. 4107) to change the corporate name of the National Safe Deposit Company of Washington; which was referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. STOCKDALE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the bill (H. R. 497) to change the time of holding the United States courts at Oshkosh, in the State of Wisconsin, from July to the second Tuesday in June in each year; which was referred to the House Calendar.

AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS FREE OF DUTY.

Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the resolution I offered this morning.

There was no objection.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas it has been established by satisfactory evidence that manufacturers of farm implements in the United States are selling farm implements in foreign countries and to jobbers for export for less than the same implements are sold to the farmers of this country; and

Whereas this fact has been further conclusively established by the answer of A. B. Farquhar, an agricultural implement maker of York, Pa., to the Home Market Club; and

Whereas the said A. B. Farquhar, as a further evidence of this fact, in answering a home market newspaper, makes the statement that "we do sell goods cheaper to customers in foreign countries directly and to jobbers for export than we do to the domestic trade. This I could not truthfully deny or candidly conceal. You would like to learn the process by which the manufacturer can afford to sell the foreign buyer goods for less than he can the home customers. The reply is simplicity itself. We receive the prices current in the markets in which we sell. We can not get more and could not be expected to take less"; and

Whereas under this system of plundering the farmers of our country they are compelled to pay more for their implements than the same implements are sold for to farmers abroad whose products are marketed in competition with the products of our farms; and

Whereas the duties upon farm implements is an unjust discrimination against American farmers for the benefit of manufacturers who do not need it, and is therefore legalized robbery; therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be, and they are hereby, instructed to report a bill to this House at an early day placing all kinds of agricultural implements on the free list.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This completes the call of committees for reports.

Mr. RAINES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill at this time for reference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman that it can be presented now through the petition box.

Mr. RAINES. This, however, is a public bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can furnish it to the Chair, and the proper reference will be made during the day.

Mr. ENLOE. I would like to inquire of the Chair if business on the Private Calendar is not now properly in order under the rule?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To what rule is the gentleman's inquiry addressed?

Mr. ENLOE. Is it in order to make a motion now to go into Committee of the Whole to consider business on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the motion is in order. Rule XXVI provides, in the first section—

Friday in every week shall be set apart for the consideration of private business, unless otherwise determined by the House.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. ENLOE. I think we had better take the opportunity we have to consider business on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is for the House to determine that. If the motion of the gentleman from Texas is voted down it will be in order to make the other motion, that the House go into Committee of the Whole to consider business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. BURROWS. But as a matter of practice, Mr. Speaker, does not the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee take precedence? I call the attention of the Chair to Rule XXIV, clause 6, that—

On Friday of each week, after the morning hour, it shall be in order to entertain a motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar; and if this motion fail, then public business shall be in order as on other days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks so, and would have held that the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee had precedence if the gentleman had submitted the motion. As a matter of fact no such motion was made, and the Chair recognized the gentleman from Texas to make the other motion.

Mr. ENLOE. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that I was trying to get an opportunity to make the motion, and was on the floor for that purpose when the gentleman from Texas addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman rose to make a parliamentary inquiry, made it, and the Chair answered it. But the gentleman did not follow it up with a motion, and of course the Chair was bound to recognize any other gentleman who did submit a motion.

Mr. ENLOE. I did fail to follow it up, for the reason that the Chair turned away and recognized the gentleman from Texas after answering my inquiry and before I could make the motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair asked the gentleman from Texas for what purpose he rose, and up to that time the gentleman from Tennessee made no attempt, so far as the Chair could see, to submit the motion. The Chair has stated to the House, however, that if the House desires to proceed with the business on the Private Calendar it can reach that by voting down the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ENLOE. I believe the motion to consider business on the Private Calendar has precedence anyhow, and I submit that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will examine into the matter.

Mr. DOCKERY. In this connection I call the attention of the Chair to clause 9, Rule XVI.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, I will relieve the Chair from any embarrassment by deciding that question myself. As we have not the reports printed yet I withdraw my motion, and will allow the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] to proceed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee does not insist upon his motion. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SAYERS. I renew my motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

URGENT DEFICIENCIES.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 5399) making appropriations to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the expenses of the Eleventh Census, and for other purposes, with Mr. RICHARDSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, namely:

ELEVENTH CENSUS.

For salaries and necessary expenses for continuing the work of compiling the results of the Eleventh Census, $200,000.

SUPERINTENDENT OF FREE DELIVERY.

To pay the salary of the superintendent of free delivery in the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, $3,000.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have some expression from some gentleman on the other side as to what time is desired for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Texas that he go on and make his statement. There may be only a brief statement to be made upon this side, and perhaps no further general debate will be required.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration carries an appropriation of $200,000 for the support of the Census Office during the remainder of the present fiscal year.

There has been appropriated to this date for the Census Office the sum of $8,325,000. Of that sum $250,000 was appropriated on the 19th day of December, 1889, for printing, and for the same purpose $350,000 on the 30th day of August, 1890, and $250,000 on the 3d day of March, 1891, making in all $850,000 for printing. On the 3d day of March, 1891, $1,000,000 were appropriated for the purpose of taking the census on farms, homes, and farm mortgages, and subsequently $87,500 for increase of salaries for supervisors.

The latest information we have as to the status of the census fund is that on the 18th day of January, last month, the balance on hand was $102,000 for the Eleventh Census and $68,000 for farms, homes, and farm mortgages, making a total balance of $170,000. The balance, as estimated for February 1, 1892, was $70,000 for the Eleventh Census and for farms, homes, and mortgages $52,000, making a total of $122,000. This does not include the appropriations for printing. From this amount should be deducted outstanding liabilities for telegraphing and outstanding accounts of special agents approximating closely to $40,000. The sum of $250,000 is estimated to be necessary to carry the work to July 1st and is additional to the balance given.

The number of employés on the roll on the 18th of January last for the Eleventh Census was 594. The number on the roll for farms, homes, and mortgages was 231, making a total of 825 employed in the Census Office at Washington on that day, of which about 80 were then on furlough. The Committee on Appropriations thought that inasmuch as Congress would be in session, $200,000 would probably be sufficient to last the office until the 1st day of July next, the end of the present fiscal year. We came to this conclusion because of the fact, as is well known to almost every member upon this floor, that should Congress make a very heavy appropriation, the Superintendent of the Census would be overrun with applications for the increase of his force. It was also thought that 825 people would be able to complete the census work early in 1893. The office has asked for $1,000,000 to finish the census.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. How does it happen that this being a part of the expenditures for the current year, which the last Congress ought to have provided for, that we find a deficiency already?

Mr. SAYERS. I could not hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. BLOUNT. The last Congress being charged with the duty of providing for the expenses of the Government for the current fiscal year, and among other things the census, etc., how does it happen that this has not been provided for, and that a rate of expenditures has been assumed by the Census Office requiring us at this early date to provide for that of which the last Congress had charge?

Mr. SAYERS. In answer to the gentleman from Georgia I would say that the cost for the taking of the census was limited by the original act of March 1, 1889, to $6,400,000. Subsequently $1,000,000 increase was made for farms, homes, and farm mortgages, and later on $87,500 for additional pay to supervisors. The appropriations have been as follows:

March 1, 1889	$1,000,000
December 19, 1889 (printing)	250,000
February 22, 1890	1,000,000
June 18, 1890	3,075,000
August 30, 1890	1,400,000
August 30, 1890 (printing)	350,000
March 3, 1891	1,000,000
March 3, 1891 (printing)	250,000
Total	8,325,000
Less for printing	850,000
	7,475,000

Now, I can not account for the deficiency, estimated at $1,000,000, except on the hypotheses, first, that the last Congress failed to make the appropriations necessary to complete the work, and, secondly, that the Census Office has employed too many assistants, clerks, and laborers, and at too high salaries and wages, in order to accomplish it within a very short time.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Will my friend allow me to help him in that answer?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. As where one Democratic brother asks another Democratic brother a question, it requires some outside help to give the answer. In the first place, I want to say to my friend from Georgia that in the last Congress the first appropriation bill which was put through was an urgent deficiency bill for $1,000,000, which the preceding Democratic Congress failed to provide. So that if he is going to make that kind of an attack this morning he should know that he will have to take a little of the responsibility.

In the next place I want to call the attention of the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. SAYERS] to the fact that it was impossible for the Superintendent of the Census or for Congress to absolutely determine what amount would be needed for the current year's work. We impose new labors upon this Census Bureau that have never been imposed upon any census bureau; and I think it is a pretty good showing when we see that only a deficiency of $200,000 is needed for the vast machinery of this Bureau.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the Superintendent of the Census Bureau asked for $1,000,000 in order to complete the census.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. But I want the gentleman to understand further that that is for the next fiscal year. It has nothing to do with the question raised here.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman from Iowa say that this will answer for the current fiscal year?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. No, sir; I think he will need another $100,000 before the 30th of June.

Mr. SAYERS. But he will not need an additional $100,000 if he does not increase his force.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. And I want to say to the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. SAYERS] that I think he will agree that there has not been an excess of employés of the Census Bureau——

Mr. SAYERS. I do not agree to that.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. And that, in order to keep within the range of the appropriation, the Superintendent of the Census and the Secretary of the Interior have faithfully and prudently reduced their force so as to keep within the limit of appropriation, and promptly brought the matter to the attention of Congress.

Mr. SAYERS. I can not agree to any such statement as that. I believe that hundreds of men and women have been employed in that office, at the instance of members of Congress and others of political influence, that ought not to have been employed. I also believe that if the Superintendent of the Census had been left to operate his Bureau without pressure from the outside, causing the appointment of an unnecessary number of incompetent people, the expenditures for the census would have been far less than they have been.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Texas allow me a question there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. SAYERS. I do.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Does the gentleman refer to the number or the quality?

Mr. SAYERS. I refer to both the quality and the number.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Has the gentleman discovered anything in our investigation to justify him in making that statement?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not suppose that the Superintendent of the Census would give any testimony against himself.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Was there any information on which you could base the statement that you made?

Mr. SAYERS. I will read some of the information which was given to us.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Very well; give us some information that will sustain that position.

Mr. SAYERS. I think it will be very interesting to the committee. Beginning on the 1st of March, 1890, there were 831 employés in the city of Washington. These did not include the employés in the field at a cost of $52,460.75?

Mr. PENDLETON. A month, week, or day?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. For what time was that?

Mr. SAYERS. That was in the month of March, 1890. In April the number was increased to 987; in May to 1,122; in June to 1,291; in July to 2,812. In August the force was reduced to 2,115. In September it was again increased to 2,212; in October to 2,238; in November to 2,184, and in December to 2,161. In January, 1891, the number was 2,151; in February 2,121; in March 2,298, and in April 3,119.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. OATES. Can the gentleman state whether there have been such an excessive number of employés there as to prevent efficient work, or did the Superintendent find work for them, upon which they were engaged all the time, and which forwarded the getting out of the census?

Mr. SAYERS. I can answer the gentleman from Alabama only thus far: I can say that information has reached me from outside sources that the salaries of incompetent persons in that office were largely increased, and that people were employed in the division of "Farms, homes, and farm mortgages" who scarcely knew the difference between a load of hay and a mortgage. [Laughter.]

Mr. OATES. They must have been very ignorant.

Mr. SAYERS. That is what I have been told, and I will say further that I believe that if a committee of investigation shall be appointed under the resolution offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. ALDERSON], and that committee does its duty, it will be found that there has been a useless expenditure of public money in that office, not only as to the salaries which have been paid, but also as to the character of the employés.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, will the gentleman from Texas permit me a question on that point?

Mr. SAYERS. Of course.

Mr. DINGLEY. Having been on the subcommittee looking into this subject, and having heard not a word of any such testimony before that committee, I wish to ask the gentleman why these facts, if they are facts, were not presented there?

Mr. SAYERS. We had nobody before us but the Superintendent of the Census and his chief clerk.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Well, you were chairman of that subcommittee, and why did you not bring those facts before the committee instead of coming in here and making such a statement? If you had stated that you had any such testimony to produce, there was not a member of the committee but would gladly have aided you in making the investigation.

Mr. SAYERS. Well, I have made the statement, and I believe that proof can be had to sustain me.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. But no such statement was made before the subcommittee, and if you had asked to bring any such evidence before it, we would all have been glad to get the information. I heard no such statements before our committee.

Mr. SAYERS. Of course you did not.

Several members addressed the Chair amid great confusion.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. RICHARDSON). The committee will be in order. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not yield.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker——

The CHAIRMAN. The committee must understand that a gentleman can not be interrupted without his consent. Does the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not yield except for a question.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. One word, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman had yielded to me, and was reading an answer from the testimony. If he withdraws that permission now and shuts me off, that is his privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] has the floor unless he yields to some gentleman.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I ask the Chair to keep order so that we can hear what is being said.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will please come to order, and gentlemen will resume their seats. It is impossible to transact business amid so much confusion. The Chair will not recognize any gentleman until members have taken their seats.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. SAYERS. I wish to make a statement first and then I will yield. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] has allowed himself to get into a very hasty passion and quite unnecessarily. In my first statement I made no reference whatever to the character of the employés or to the work done in the Census Office, but only as to the expenditures. But when the gentleman from Iowa rose and made the broad statement that the office had been economically, prudently, and wisely administered, and asked me to confirm it, I felt it my duty, from what I have heard from parties on the outside, to refuse to give his statement my entire assent.

The Superintendent of the Census, with the exception of his chief clerk, Mr. Childs, was the only gentleman heard by the subcommittee, and of course neither of them gave such information. The information to which I have referred comes from other parties. I therefore say—because I would not impose upon anyone—that there was no testimony given before our subcommittee which would justify me in the statement which I have made here, but since the Committee on Appropriations directed me to make this report I have received information, which I deem reliable, to the effect that there have been a large number of useless and incompetent employés in that office, some of them drawing $100 a month, though utterly unable to properly discharge their duties. I believe further that if a committee shall be appointed to investigate this office under the resolution offered by the gentleman from West Virginia, that committee will be able to secure such evidence as will more than justify me in the statement which I have made. I will add, if the question has been thrust upon the House, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] and nobody else is responsible for it. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] for a question.

Mr. OATES. When I asked the gentleman a moment ago whether he could state that a greater number of employés were engaged in the Census Office than could be efficiently employed there, my purpose was to elicit information. So far as my information goes, the work of the office seems to have progressed with commendable rapidity.

I would like to have the gentleman state, if he can do so, the kind of work on which employés were engaged and for which there was no use. I understood the gentleman to say that there were employés there who were unskilled, but yet were kept on the rolls though they rendered no efficient service.

Mr. SAYERS. Well, I have been informed that many of those who were employed in the division of "farms, homes, and farm mortgages" in the office in this city were utterly incapable of properly doing their work.

Mr. OATES. Was the number of employés greatly increased by the addition of unskilled persons?

Mr. SAYERS. I can not answer that; but what I mean to say is this: I believe that so far as the employment of his force is concerned, if the Superintendent had been left to himself, and had been relieved of the pressure which was brought to bear upon him for the appointment of clerks, etc., a better class of employés would have been engaged in that office and not so many would have been employed. I so believe. I desire to do justice to the Superintendent.

Mr. OATES. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the examination during the last Congress by the Committee on Civil Service Reform did not elicit evidence that Mr. Porter had managed his Bureau with very great success and in a more satisfactory manner than has been the case in Departments where the civil-service law had been applied?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not believe that it has been possible for Mr. Porter to manage it so well. It is my opinion that if there has been a wasteful expenditure of money and an employment of incompetent people, it was not so much the fault of the Superintendent as because of the pressure from the outside.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask my friend from Texas whether the superior character of the work of the Census Bureau resulted from the fact that under the operation of the law the Administration was enabled to employ in that department without any civil-service examination a great number of persons, most of whom were Republicans?

Mr. SAYERS. I can not answer the question. I know but little about the civil service.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Do you not know as much about it as any member of your party?

Mr. SAYERS. Probably I know as much as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. BLOUNT. The point of my question was whether this Administration, which has been posing as a "civil-service" Administration, had not seen fit, in spite of its professed principles, to retain these people in official employment without any civil-service examination, most of them being members of their own political organization. I wish to know whether that is not one of the beauties of the present system of administration.

Mr. SAYERS. I wish to say, in justice to Mr. Porter, that I believe he has appointed Democrats as well as Republicans.

A MEMBER. What proportion?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not know the proportion; but I repeat my belief that an inquiry into the administration of this office will show that there has been a useless expenditure of public money and the employment of a greater number of officials than was necessary; and that this resulted from the pressure brought to bear upon him for the making of these appointments.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I will ask the gentleman whether he does not know that an examination was required of these clerks on the skilled rolls, and that they could not get their appointments without passing that examination, no matter what the political pressure was.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman wishes to know what I have heard I can give him that information.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I want your knowledge.

Mr. SAYERS. I have heard the very reverse of that. If the gentleman wants me to state——

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I want to know whether the gentleman has any knowledge to convey to the House, and if he has any knowledge, I want to know whether it is not the fact that every applicant for a position on the skilled rolls in the Census Office has been required to pass an examination, and that if an applicant failed to pass that examination no political influence could secure his appointment?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not know that.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I know that to be true.

Mr. SAYERS. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois this question: What is the relative comparison in numbers between those who are employed on the skilled rolls and those who are not? As the gentleman seems to know all about this business, can he answer the question?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I know that so far as the skilled labor is concerned, the service in that Bureau has been as efficient as you will find in any Department of the Government——

Mr. SAYERS. I am asking as to the proportion between the skilled and the unskilled employés.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. And I know that the proportion of the skilled to the unskilled labor is as great there as in any other Department of the Government.

Mr. MCKAIG. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SAYERS. I will.

Mr. MCKAIG. The gentleman who has just spoken has paid a very handsome tribute to the "skilled labor" in that Department. I wish to say that as the mayor of the city of Cumberland, after the enumerators had passed through the city wards and made their report to the Department, it was found that an error had been made of about 1,050 votes in that city, and it took myself, as mayor, and a portion of the city council over six months to trace up through the Department the mistake and correct it. So that an ordinary clerical error made in the enumeration or tabulation had to be corrected by the Department itself.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Well, the mayor of Cumberland is talking of one class of men and I am talking of another.

Mr. MCKAIG. I am talking of the class of men that I understand the gentleman who has just spoken has been talking about.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I am not talking of the enumerators.

Mr. MCKAIG. What class is the gentleman talking of?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I am talking of the skilled laborers here in Washington.

Mr. MCKAIG. That is just the class that I have been speaking of. I have stated that the enumerators made their report, and the mistake was made here by that skilled clerical force. The enumerators had it correct; they sent it here, and the skilled laborers of whom the gentleman speaks neglected to put it into proper shape. That is all, and it was the skilled laborers that made the mistake.

Mind you, Mr. Speaker, that there was no recount made, it was only a correction which was made here. The error was made in this way: They had taken a street in the city and given it to one of the country districts, and when that was traced the error was corrected, as I have stated.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I am not prepared to discuss this matter with the mayor of Cumberland, but I would prefer to take the official reports to the statements of any member outside as to the accuracy of that work.

Mr. MCKAIG. I will state that the official report to the Department gave the city 13,729 inhabitants. By tracing up in the Department the error that we claimed, the correction was made in the Department. That was the evidence on which the correction was made. In other words, the evidence was in the Department.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentlemen on the other side, as I desire to be fair, what amount of time they would like in the discussion of this item?

Mr. DINGLEY. In response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas, in charge of the bill, I simply desire to say that I supposed but a very short time would be occupied in this general debate; but what questions are to be launched upon the House I am unable now to determine.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman indicate the time he would like.

Mr. DINGLEY. I was going on to say that the gentleman from Texas has already launched upon the House an assault upon the Superintendent of the Census that was never heard of before, either in the committee or in the subcommittee which prepared this bill.

Mr. SAYERS. Of course, for, as I have said, we had nobody before us but the Superintendent and his chief clerk.

Mr. DINGLEY. Ah, but if the gentleman had the information he should have laid it before the committee, in order that an investigation might be made.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman from Iowa began the controversy. He asked me to give an indorsement to the action of the Superintendent.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. But it was while answering the gentleman from Georgia that you made reflections which called for the statement I made.

Mr. SAYERS. How much time does the gentleman from Maine desire?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will take the floor in my own right. It is scarcely necessary to fix a limit, because I do not think much time will be consumed.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well; I will yield the floor to the gentleman.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman from Texas yields the floor I would like to ask, for information, whether the increase from month to month in this Bureau, which is given and specified in his statement, was not necessary, as the business of the department increased, and as it went on to consummation. And in the next place I want the gentleman to inform the House, if he can, how the expense of this work compares with the cost of the census preceding—that is, the Tenth Census.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the gentleman from Texas desires to answer the questions I will not take the floor at present.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I have no information, which is altogether reliable, as to why it was that the number of employés varied so largely during the several months of the last preceding year. We had no one before us except the Superintendent of Census and the chief clerk; and inasmuch as we were informed that unless the appropriation was made the funds would be exhausted by the 1st of March, the committee could not take time to investigate the office, and merely recommended this appropriation, believing that before we should appropriate the remainder of the amount called for, which is $800,000, we would have abundant time to investigate the work of the office.

Mr. RAINES. With the permission of the gentleman from Texas, I want to make a statement right here, for the benefit of the chairman, if he has no objection.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. RAINES. I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the sudden increase in the force in April was at the time they commenced to tabulate the returns of the enumerators, and grew out of the reappointment of the force for three months. A large proportion of it being appointed for three months longer occasioned the sudden increase.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] will give his attention to the reading of the document which I send to the Clerk's desk, he will find an answer to the second part of his interrogatory, that is, as to the relative cost of the taking of the Tenth and Eleventh Censuses.

The Clerk proceeded to read. Having read for some time,

Mr. SAYERS said: Mr. Chairman, I will ask the permission of the committee to insert the rest of Mr. Porter's statement as to the comparative cost of the Tenth and Eleventh Censuses. There are several pages more to be read, and I do not think it will be well to detain the committee further, but will ask to have the remainder inserted in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to have the remainder of the statement printed in the RECORD. If there be no objection that request will be granted.

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows:

COMPARATIVE COST OF THE TENTH AND ELEVENTH CENSUSES.

In answer to the question of the chairman as to the comparative cost of the Tenth and Eleventh Censuses, I have the honor to state that such a comparison of cost is apt to be misleading, unless due allowance is made for the additional and expensive inquiries required of the Eleventh Census and for the difference in the methods of collecting data. Comparisons likewise which take into consideration the cost of printing are also unfair because such cost depends almost wholly on the number of copies of the several volumes ordered by Congress.

The appropriation for printing, aggregating to the present time $850,000 for the present census, of which amount about $400,000 is still available, and of $1,018,116, the amount appropriated for the Tenth Census, will therefore be omitted in this comparison. The Fifty-first Congress ordered an elaborate investigation of the mortgage indebtedness of the country, and appropriated $1,000,000 for that purpose. I had the honor to inform the two committees of Congress at the time that this work alone would probably cost $1,500,000, and I am still of that opinion. The same Congress doubled the pay of supervisors, and made an appropriation of $75,000 to defray the cost of this wise action. In all comparisons with the cost of the Tenth Census these appropriations must be omitted.

In all comparative statements of the cost of the census, a total appropriation of $6,400,000 a must be used for the Eleventh Census, and $4,976,910 b for the Tenth Census; but even this comparison is hardly fair to the Eleventh Census for several reasons. In the first place, over $1,000,000 have been expended upon inquiries, such as that relating to the names, organizations, and length of service of those who had served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the war of the Rebellion, and who were survivors at the time of said inquiry, and the widows of soldiers, sailors, or marines, and other inquiries, not included in the scope of the Tenth Census. To this must be added the amount of money unexpended December 31, 1891, $128,007.23, making a total for comparative purposes of $6,350,072.71. The per capita cost of the Eleventh Census up to this date has therefore been 10.05 cents, and 9.93 cents c for the Tenth Census. In speaking of the cost of the Tenth Census, my predecessor, Gen. Walker, said in the Quarterly Journal of Economics, June, 1883:

"In undertaking a discussion as to what should be done towards the performance of this most important constitutional function, it will, perhaps, be well to recognize the fact that the preparations for the Eleventh Census are likely to be in some degree embarrassed by the financial and other misfortunes which befel its immediate predecessor. The successive deficiency appropriations for that work, the delays in the publication of some of the latter volumes, together with the newspaper attacks upon the census, which became epidemical in 1882 and 1883, have created in the minds of most of those who have any impression at all on the subject the belief that the Tenth Census was extravagantly expensive. Yet no opinion could be more unfounded. The fact is that, considering the new ground covered, the Tenth Census was a marvel of cheapness. Even if we leave out all consideration of the great extent and variety of statistical work then for the first time undertaken, and treat all this as having cost absolutely nothing, we shall still find that the cost of the Tenth Census per capita of inhabitants exceeded that of the Ninth Census by far less than the ratio in which the cost of the Ninth Census exceeded that of the Eighth d, yet no one ever took exception to the expenditures of 1870-'72, and that work was finished to public satisfaction. A continuous progressive enhancement in the per capita cost of successive censuses is to be anticipated, even though the scope of enumeration be in no degree widened by reason of the continually expanding detail into which the traditional classes of statistics will inevitably be drawn under the ever-growing popular demand for local and minute information. On the other hand, if the scope of enumeration is to be widened, this must be paid for, and paid for handsomely."

The change in the method of collecting the data relating to manufactures, vital statistics, mines and mining, and in other divisions as already explained to the subcommittee and committee, by employing per diem special agents, has undoubtedly increased the cost, and while the population of the country has increased 25 per cent during the decade, the agricultural, mining, and manufacturing interests have increased from 50 to 100 per cent, enhancing immensely the cost of getting the material; but the results are far more accurate and valuable. Including the amount paid enumerators and supervisors, the total cost of the collection of the data for the Eleventh Census has been $3,600,385.36. Not only was the cost of collecting the statistics of manufactures, mines and mining, vital statistics, etc., increased under the present act authorizing the Superintendent of Census to withdraw schedules from enumerators and use other and more efficient methods, but the pay for collecting the agricultural schedules was likewise increased by Congress.

Should the Eleventh Census therefore show, when completed, a slightly increased per capita cost, it will be due to the ever-growing popular demand for local and minute information, and for the better work, better methods, and better pay allowed for collecting manufacturing and agricultural schedules. And this increased per captia cost has not been peculiar to the Eleventh Census, the Eighth Census costing relatively more than the Seventh, the Ninth 2.46 cents per capita more than the Eighth, and the Tenth, as we have seen, 1.22 cents per capita more than the Ninth. These facts will show that the Eleventh Census has been conducted with rigid regard to economy; that the large force, both in field and in office, has been subject to rules and restrictions, and obliged to do an amount of work that in some of the departments of Government work would have been regarded as excessive.

a Appropriated for Eleventh Census, exclusive of printing, and farms, homes, and mortgages:

March 1, 1889	$1,000,000
June 18, 1890	3,000,000
August 30, 1890	1,400,000
March 3, 1891	1,000,000
Total	6,400,000

b Appropriated for Tenth Census, exclusive of printing:

March 3, 1879	$250,000
April 20, 1880	125,000
June 16, 1880	2,960,000
March 3, 1881	500,000
January 28, 1882	540,000
August 7, 1882	245,000
August 8, 1882	80,000
Other appropriations	276,910
Total	4,976,910

c This per capita is correct; the discrepancy between this amount and the per capita for the Tenth Census given in note d is probably due to the omission in the Journal quoted of certain appropriations.

d The cost per capita of inhabitants of the last four censuses, exclusive of printing and engraving, was as follows:

	Cents.
Seventh Census, 1850	5.84
Eighth Census, 1860	6.25
Ninth Census, 1870	8.71
Tenth Census, 1880	9.68

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I would ask another question of the chairman. I understand, as far as I could gather from the reading, in the noise and confusion in the House, that the answer of the Superintendent of the Census before the committee, in reference to the comparative cost of the taking of the Tenth and Eleventh Censuses, is that under the law he was required to inquire into matters that were not embraced in the Tenth Census, with regard to many things; that is to say, that under the law a broader scope and more general information were included, particularly with reference to some matters which it was considered very essential to have in the census than were embraced in the Tenth Census, and that therefore the increased expenditures in the taking of the Eleventh Census, as compared with the Tenth Census, are thus reasonably accounted for. Now, what I want to ask my friend is this: If that information, given by the Superintendent of the Census, Mr. Porter, was not satisfactory to the committee, why did not the committee prosecute the investigation, in order to be able to report to the House whether we could rely implicitly upon the report of the Superintendent of the Census?

Mr. SAYERS. For the reason, Mr. Chairman, that we were informed that unless this appropriation was made by the 1st day of March the Census Office would have to cease work. We thought that it was far better to recommend an appropriation of $200,000, keeping the office continuously at work, than to force it, for the want of money, to discharge all its employés. The office has not got more than enough money to last it until the 1st of March. That was the reason for our reporting this bill without first gathering the information which the gentleman desires.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has the floor. Does he yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. ENLOE. If the gentleman from Maine wants to address the committee, I do not care to take the floor.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman from Texas has the floor, if the gentleman from Tennessee wishes to ask him any questions.

Mr. ENLOE. I wanted to ask the gentleman from Texas if he had any objection to taking a vote upon this bill?

Mr. SAYERS. Not at all, but I understand gentlemen on the other side desire to speak upon it.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I did not hear my friend explain the provisions of the bill for the pay of the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] has five minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. SAYERS. In relation to the second item which appears in the bill, I will say that it comes from the fact that in the enrollment of an appropriation bill in the last Congress, although in the bill as it passed both Houses, yet it was accidentally omitted in the enrollment, and this is simply to correct an error and to provide for an omitted salary resulting from that error.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that the chairman of the subcommittee in charge of this bill [Mr. SAYERS] has seen fit to present, in the general discussion, certain charges against the Superintendent of the Census with reference to the conduct of his office that were never suggested in committee when we were preparing the bill. It seems to me that if such charges were to be made in the House it was but just that the gentleman from Texas, whether he received this information from some anonymous source without the committee or from whatever source it may have come, should have advised the committee of the fact that such insinuations had been made, whereupon I am sure that the minority of the committee would have insisted that full investigation should have been had upon the charges before reporting the bill to the House.

It is certainly very unfair to the Superintendent of the Census, if not unprecedented in the practice of the House, for a committee having charge of an appropriation bill to consider that bill from beginning to end and unanimously reach a conclusion respecting it, and never to have heard during the progress of discussion in the committee, a single suggestion that any charge was to come, especially from the member of the committee having charge of the bill.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. DINGLEY. I do.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman assumes the role of a lecturer.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all. It is the gentleman from Texas who assumed that role when he made these charges against the Superintendent.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] will read this debate when it is printed in the RECORD, the gentleman will find that this whole controversy was provoked, not by anything that I said at the commencement, but by questions that were propounded to me by gentlemen on the floor, inlcuding that of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON]. If I had been left to myself and no questions had been asked, I should not have alluded to this matter at all.

Mr. DINGLEY. I accept that explanation.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I want to know if the gentleman from Texas is inclined to do an injustice to the Census Office because some member on the floor has that inclination?

Mr. SAYERS. I am not doing an injustice to the Census Office.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. But gentlemen who take the other side seem to think that the gentleman is doing it an injustice.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the suggestion which I have to make, and with all candor to all gentlemen, as this is a matter of common interest to all, is this: If there has been any improper management in the Census Office in the direction suggested by the gentleman from Texas, if there has been employment of unfit men who have been borne upon the rolls and received compensation without performing any service to the Government, it was a matter that should have been brought to the attention of the committee and an investigation made, and not launched here where the members of the committee can not have an opportunity to know whether there is any foundation for such anonymous charges.

Not a single suggestion, Mr. Chairman, was made in the examination of this bill that there had been any improper conduct in the Census Office in the direction which has been alluded to. The expectation was that this bill would be considered simply with reference to the propriety of making this deficiency appropriation in order to carry out certain work which the Census Office has undertaken. I am sure, Mr. Chairman, there has been an injustice done to the Superintendent of the Census. If these anonymous charges had been brought to the attention of the committee and investigated, and an answer received from the Superintendent of the Census, we should have found that they had no substantial foundation; and I regret, therefore, that such suggestions should have been made on this floor without an opportunity to investigate them.

I assume, Mr. Chairman, and my own investigation simply corroborates that assumption, that the Superintendent of the Census has faithfully and efficiently discharged the duty which has been intrusted to him. The fact that in some months the force has been largely increased is due entirely to the fact that in those months more reports were received which could be compiled and forwarded than in some other months. I desire to say that so far as our investigations have gone we have found that the work of the Census Office has been expedited at least a year ahead of what was the case in the Tenth Census. Now, I take it that the value of a census is largely dependent upon its early compilation and publication.

If I were to criticise previous censuses, it would be in the direction that those statistics which have been gathered and which were supposed to be valuable to the public had not been compiled and published in season to make them of the most value to the public. I understand it is the purpose of Superintendent Porter to expedite this work as rapidly as possible; and he believes that in doing so he not only secures in the end the highest economy, but also best promotes the public interest. I think, Mr. Chairman, that when the facts shall be entirely known, it will be found that the Eleventh Census is the best and the most complete that has been published, and that it is likely to be completed at the earliest period ever known in the history of any census of this country, considering the scope of its work.

Now, inquiry has been made how it happened that this census is costing more than the Tenth Census. It costs more from the fact, in the first place, that the expense of a census necessarily depends almost entirely upon the number of persons to be enumerated and the extent of the industrial statistics to be gathered. The population of this country has increased 22 per cent since 1880. It is evident that the census of 1890, even if confined to population, would involve an increased expenditure somewhat in proportion to the increase in population.

But, more than that, Mr. Chairman, the industries of this country have grown more rapidly than the population. The industries of this country have grown at twice the rate of the population of the country; and that necessitates an increased expense in collecting the data.

More than that, Mr. Chairman, Congress imposed upon the Superintendent of the Census certain work never before undertaken in the preparation of a decennial census. In the first place, we required, or expected, that the manufacturing statistics should be collected more largely by experts thoroughly acquainted with a particular industry. Experience had shown that in prior censuses, where the ordinary enumerators, who visited an enumeration district and enumerated the population, obtained in connection with that the manufacturing statistics, they were very defective. The ordinary enumerator is not a person to be intrusted with the collection of data in relation to the great industries of the country. For this reason the Superintendent of Census committed the work of collecting industrial statistics largely to experts thoroughly acquainted with the particular industries with which they were to deal. Necessarily this caused an increase of expense in that direction.

An expert who had thorough knowledge respecting an industry could not be obtained for the same compensation that an enumerator could, but the work of the former would be worth tenfold that of the latter. Beyond that, Congress imposed upon the enumerators the additional labor of collecting the names and record of all the soldiers in the country who served in the war of the rebellion. Now, this enlarged the work of even the enumerators very greatly, and the result is that this is one of the items which has tended to increase the expenditures. But, beyond that, Mr. Chairman, the one thing that has most largely increased the expense of the Eleventh Census lies in the fact that, by direction of Congress and against the advice of the Superintendent of the Census, Congress required the Census Office to collect the data relating to mortgages of real estate.

We appropriated at the beginning $1,000,000 for this purpose, but the Superintendent of the Census informs us that probably a half a million more will be required in order to complete this investigation, or at least $350,000 more; and when he asks for $1,000,000, not only for the balance of the fiscal year but for the next fiscal year, to complete the census, there is included in that million dollars $350,000, which is estimated as the least cost of completing the census of mortgages on real estate. I was one of those who did not believe that the requirement imposed upon the Census Office to collect data in relation to mortgages on real estate would have any important economic value, and now that the statistics have been largely obtained, I find that my opinion on that point has been justified. I think this investigation was ordered originally, not from economic considerations or considerations having reference to the public welfare, but for partisan reasons. I rejoice that the preliminary Census Bulletin on this subject shows very clearly that there is no foundation for the charge which has been so industriously made for partisan purposes that three-fourths the farmers of this country had been compelled by disaster to mortgage their farms, and that these mortgages are daily increasing, and the rate of interest increasing, until it had become only a question of time when universal ruin would overtake them.

That partisan and unfounded idea is dispelled by the Census Bulletin which I have before me.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DINGLEY: Certainly.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to ask a question for information. In how many States of the Union has the Superintendent of the Census completed the inquiry as to farm mortgages?

Mr. DINGLEY. It is completed only as to five States, but I imagine that a similar result will be found elsewhere throughout the country.

Mr. DOCKERY. I supposed, from the vigor of the gentleman's statement, that the inquiry was substantially completed, but he seems to have reached a conclusion without hearing the evidence.

Mr. DINGLEY. No; the Superintendent of the Census has simply reported the facts as to the five States in which the investigation has been completed, and they are given in Census Bulletin 16; and there is no reason to suppose that the reports from other States will be dissimilar from those reported.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is Kansas one of those States?

Mr. DINGLEY. It is; and there is where the calamity and distress of mortgaged farmers were supposed to be deepest.

Mr. DOCKERY. If I am correctly informed, the statistics in reference to Kansas, so far as they have been tabulated, show a mortgage indebtedness upon farms and town lots amounting in round numbers to $235,000,000 upon an assessed valuation of but $290,000,000.

Mr. DINGLEY Oh, I trust the gentleman will not confound mortgages on corner lots in "boom" towns with mortgages on farms. Farmers are one thing and town-lot speculators are another.

Mr. DOCKERY. But I understand that $170,000,000 of this $235,000,000 of mortgages rest upon farms of the State of Kansas.

Mr. SIMPSON. That is correct.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say anything upon this branch of the subject until some subsequent time when the question should be before the House.

Mr. DOCKERY. If the gentleman from Maine will hold his judgment in abeyance until he gets all the information, perhaps he will reach a different conclusion.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] has called my attention to the matter, I will place in the RECORD, without reading, the result of this investigation in the five States in which it has been completed. I presume that a similar result will be found in the other States, taken as a whole. Now, the general result is this, that the mortgages upon farms have generally decreased within a few years, notwithstanding the increase of the number of farms; that the rate of interest has been diminished 1 per cent; and further, that more than 90 per cent of all the mortgages that have been given upon farm lands have been given for purposes which implied the prosperity, or, at least, not the adversity, of the farmer, such as purchase money of the farms which they occupy, buying new lands, making improvements, etc.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then they have $170,000,000 of "prosperity" in Kansas in the form of mortgages upon their farms. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman from Maine permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will yield for a question only, not for a speech.

Mr. SIMPSON. I understood the gentleman to say that the farm mortgages were decreasing in amount, and then, later, he said that the purposes for which these farm mortgages were given indicated the prosperity of the farmers. Now, if the mortgages are decreasing, does that not show, upon his principle, that the prosperity is decreasing also? [Laughter.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, no. But, Mr. Chairman, this illustrates the way in which a certain class of gentlemen deal with this subject. Because a farmer mortgages his property to buy a farm or build a house, or because I may mortgage any property that I may own for the purpose of getting a loan to buy more property, or to improve that which I own, it certainly is not to be inferred that I am in a state of misfortune or distress. But the statistics show just the purposes for which the mortgages were made in these five States, running from the purchase of land to the erection of buildings and making other improvements, the whole tending to show a condition of prosperity rather than otherwise. Undoubtedly in those parts of Kansas affected by drought there is more or less distress, arising principally from the climate and not from other causes. But, without entering further upon the matter at this time, I will let the statistics show for themselves.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not care to be drawn into a discussion of a subject that will come up by and by for discussion. I have only alluded to it incidentally——

Mr. BUTLER. It is very much in point right here, I think.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have only alluded to the subject for the purpose of showing that the great cause of the increased expenditure incurred in the taking of the last census is to be found in the fact that Congress—and I am responsible with others in that respect—imposed upon the Census Bureau a duty heretofore unheard of, the duty of inquiring into the private business of individuals to ascertain whether they had mortgaged their property, and, if so, for what purpose they had done it.

The above tables give us the preliminary facts; and I simply say that I rejoice that they confound the gentlemen who introduced the proposition for the purpose of obtaining what they supposed would be evidence that disaster is driving the farmers of the country to mortgage their property beyond redemption in increasing ratio.

Now, Mr. Chairman, passing from that subject, my friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] who has charge of this bill has already had read at the Clerk's desk the statements made by the Superintendent of the Census before the subcommittee, covering the points of comparative cost of the Tenth and Eleventh Censuses.

Mr. SAYERS. I have already placed that in the RECORD.

Mr. DINGLEY. I simply call attention to the conclusions. I understand that practically the cost of the Tenth Census was in the neighborhood of 10 cents per capita; that the cost of the Eleventh Census, outside of the mortgages of real estate, is about 11 cents per capita, which is a very small increase considering the fact that the investigations in connection with this census have gone farther and been more thorough than any ever before undertaken in any census.

Now, with reference to the single point of the expenses of the census. There has been appropriated up to the present time, as already stated, I think, by the gentleman in charge of the bill, $8,325,000—one million was appropriated by the Fiftieth Congress and the balance by the Fifty-first Congress—of which $1,000,000 was appropriated for obtaining the facts relating to mortgages of real estate, $75,000 for extra pay for supervisors, and $850,000 for printing. Now, if the appropriation made by the last Congress for all census purposes, $7,325,000, had been appropriated in gross instead of by items for specific purposes, no deficiency would have been called for for the present fiscal year. On the 1st day of January there remained on hand of the general appropriation a balance of $128,000. There remained on hand of the $1,000,000 appropriated for statistics of farm mortgages a balance of $75,000; but of the printing appropriation there remained on hand $405,000.

Now, this balance of the printing appropriation can not be used for the general purposes of the census. It will not all be used—not one-half of it will be used—up to the close of the fiscal year; and therefore, at the end of that time, it will either be covered into the Treasury or will go over (as I believe the appropriation is a continuing one) to the next fiscal year. Therefore, as I have already remarked, this deficiency is necessitated by the fact that but one item of the appropriation proves to be insufficient for the expense; and though other items have proved to be more than sufficient, the balance of the appropriation for printing can not be transferred to the general work of the census.

Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to be drawn off into the discussion of any collateral question. I think the statements which have been already made by the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. SAYERS], and by my colleague, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], cover all the facts necessary to enlighten the judgment of the House.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied twenty-five minutes, and has thirty-five minutes remaining.

Mr. DINGLEY. I reserve the rest of my time.

Mr. DUNGAN. Mr. Chairman, it never can be otherwise than unpleasant for any man to be called upon to act on what seems to be vague charges; but it is just as unpleasant for a man to be called on to vote an appropriation when he has heard charges so specifically made that he can not refuse to think them deserving of investigation. I may say that a few weeks ago, had I known the committee were considering this matter, I would have felt it my duty to lay before them the information in my possession; but I had no knowledge that this appropriation was being considered or that a deficiency was to be made up.

I am told that there appeared in the Washington Post last summer (and this is a matter of easy verification) an interview with Mr. Porter, the Superintendent of the Census, relating to the question why so many employés were being discharged from his Bureau. The rumor seemed to have gained ground that these discharges were because the appropriation had been exhausted. In this interview, as reported, Mr. Porter said that this was not the reason, but that on the contrary the appropriation would be sufficient to complete the work of the census. An interview of similar import appeared, I understand, in the Evening Star, another newspaper of this city. Now, that statement was made so specifically and is so easy of verification that I would feel unable to vote to appropriate for a deficiency without seeing some explanation of that matter.

The charge was also made specifically—and I will give it with as much definiteness as it came to me—that many tons of printed matter had been thrown away and were lying stacked up in two places (one being in the Pension building, as I remember) because this information which that Bureau had obtained and printed had been found so inaccurate as to be absolutely useless, the cost of gathering that inaccurate and useless information having been a great many thousand dollars, the expense of printing being a smaller item.

Another charge was made, also easy of verification when the committee takes hold of the matter. This was that the Superintendent of Census had caused to be employed a lot of punching machines, the invention of a relative, at a royalty of $3 a day, and that many hundreds of these machines were used for many weeks, when that machine as a whole could be constructed for less than $10. Now, if the appropriation for the expenses of the census has been exhausted in such ways as that, an investigation can readily be made, and the facts are easy of verification.

Until some such light is shed upon it I can not feel, Mr. Chairman, willing to vote for a deficiency appropriation to continue the work under such management. I will be glad to furnish the committee having the matter in charge with the names of men I heard make specific statements such as I have suggested, and they seemed to know what they were talking about. Other charges have been made, which would not be proper to mention in a public way, and which the mind hesitates to believe, but I will also give to the committee the names of the parties making them if desired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I beg the indulgence of the House while I call attention to a portion of the work of this census which has inflicted an injury upon one of our most important and extensive industries. I refer to the production of limestone for building purposes. There are about 2,000 limestone quarries in the United States, and some may be found in almost every State and Territory; they represent millions of dollars of invested capital; they employ thousands of laborers, skilled and unskilled; they contribute annually millions of dollars to the wealth of the country, and while there is every reason why this industry should have at least fair treatment, if not the friendly recognition of the Government, there is absolutely no reason why it should be made the subject of unjust discrimination and hostile attack.

It is natural that an enterprise of this character and magnitude, in its struggle for recognition and in its competition with other kinds of building materials, should be subject to some hostile criticism as the result of opposition and rivalry in business. This is to be expected, and can either be met and answered or endured in silence. But, Mr. Speaker, it is unnatural and unfair for the Government to interfere in such a contest, and under cover of a bureau organized for the purpose of ascertaining our resources and fairly displaying them before the world to become a partisan of some and an opponent to others, among equally meritorious but contending enterprises, and such a course can not be passed in silence, but should meet with prompt and emphatic condemnation.

I hold in my hand Census Bulletin No. 78, which purports to give a survey of the limestone industry of the United States, and I wish to read for the information of the House the manner in which this bulletin treats this important matter.

Limestone of all kinds is readily susceptible to the decomposing action of acids, and this fact is very important in connection with the use of limestone as a building material or for purposes which involve its exposure to the weather. The atmosphere of large manufacturing cities is particularly liable to contain acid vapors, which, dissolved and precipitated by rain, cause rapid disintegration and defacement of limestone structures. Highly compact and pure limestones are less liable than other kinds to disintegration from acids, and dolomite, when pure and compact, is among the most durable when exposed to atmospheric agencies. The presence of impurities, rendering the stone absorptive and porous are especially objectionable. Costly and rash experiments in the use of limestone for outside building have resulted, within the last quarter of a century, in causing the exercise of greater care in the adoption of limestone as building material, under conditions favorable to rapid disintegration. When limestone is exposed to intense heat, such as is incident to a conflagration, the stone is to a greater or less extent decomposed into lime, and thus it is that walls built of limestone disintegrate and crumble to pieces in cases of serious conflagrations. This fact is one which should, of course, be carefully considered in the selection of limestone as a structural material.

The detailed uses to which ordinary limestone is put are numerous, and some of them are of vast importance, because they can not be fulfilled by any other kind of stone. Some of the uses to which limestone is put bring it into competition with the granites and sandstone, such as building of all kinds, road making, and structural purposes generally. In many of these cases limestone is inferior to other kinds of stone, and is selected on account of accessibility or cheapness. In its application to lime burning and blast-furnace flux, however, limestone stands alone, and, as will be seen from the table of production, large quantities are devoted to these purposes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the purport and substance of these two paragraphs is that limestone is practically unfit for building purposes; that it decomposes, disintegrates, and crumbles, and is only to be used as a substitute when other and more valuable materials are inaccessible or too expensive, and that it is chiefly valuable for burning into lime. It is true that further on, in a kind of a footnote to a tabular statement on page 12, this statement is made, which I read:

Considering the first table relative to value, it is evident that for building purposes Illinois stands first. The large amount devoted to building purposes in this state comes chiefly from the Joliet and Lemont quarry regions, and the product from these places is largely used for building. Indiana stands second in value, and the stone which contributes largely to the value given, namely, $994,313, is the oölitic limestone, which is at present quite popular, not only in the immediate vicinity, but in many of the larger and more important cities of the country, both east and west.

But, even here, while speaking of the oölitic limestone of Indiana, the language is that it "is at present very popular."

Of course, Mr. Chairman, we are very grateful for this concession, but it is so guarded and qualified by the use of the term "at present" that we have good reason to fear that before this work is finished it will be revised, and even this temporary popularity, which we are so grudgingly conceding will be found to have passed away. In the various addresses and magazine articles which the Superintendent of the Census has made and published throughout the country in its defense, he complains of unfair treatment and attributes interested, and even dishonest, motives to all who have made an attack upon it. In a speech made by him in Boston in October last he said:

Up to the present time the work of the Census Bureau has been repeatedly attacked but not criticised. These attacks have generally come from newspapers in communities where the population did not come up to the expectation; where recounts were asked for and refused on good grounds, or where recounts were forced upon the people in spite of protest. Then there are all kinds of boomers, who attack the census to justify their own ridiculous estimates—the land boomer, who wants to sell real estate, thinks the population too small; the geological boomer, who wants to get a big appropriation from the State Legislature, inflates the value and output of the stone quarries and coal mines of his State; persons interested in schools, etc.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have the honor to represent a portion of Indiana which is very rich in its limestone deposits, and which, with one or two counties from an adjoining district, represented by my colleague, Mr. BRETZ, supplies nearly the entire oölitic limestone output of the United States, and it is not for partisan purposes, nor to indulge any spirit of captious criticism, nor to gratify any personal ambition, that I make the statements which I am about to submit. On the contrary, I appear at the instigation of men who are prominent in the Republican party as well as my own, and in behalf of men of all parties who are alike outraged in their feelings by this uncalled for attack upon their interests, and what I shall say will be supported by the testimony of men who are eminent in their professional standing, as well as unimpeachable in their character.

I desire first to call attention to the testimony of Prof. John Collett as to the character and utility of this stone. Prof. Collett, now a venerable and venerated citizen of Indiana, was for many years the State geologist of the State, and for his great learning and high character he is well known to the scientists, both of this country and of Europe. It was he who discovered and brought to the attention of European capitalists the extensive coal fields of Indiana. He is not a "geological boomer," but an honest man, who, though he has often pointed out the path of fortune to others, never walked in it himself. From page 41 of his Geological Report for 1881 I quote:

The oölitic limestone, which forms the leading feature of the foregoing series of experiments, is so little known beyond the immediate neighborhood where it is quarried, that it may not be out of place to give a fuller description of it and of its character as a building stone.

Geologically it belongs to the St. Louis group of the subcarboniferous period and has been formed from the crushed remains of the marine shells, corals, etc. These have been pulverized to the condition of fine sand; their soluble impurities washed away, and their insoluble residue reunited into solid rock by a reposit of carbonate of lime as a cementing material. Its structure is, therefore, that of a close-grained, compact sandstone, while chemically it is a limestone of rare purity.

Like the sandstones, it works freely under the tool, while the homogeneity of its particles and binding material enables it to be worked to a clean, sharp arris. Like the sandstones, also, and unlike other limestones, its formation in the ledge is massive and solid, not stratified with clay partings. It has no well-defined cleavage in either direction, and is of nearly equal strength whether on "edge" or on "bed." The formation is generally about 40 feet in thickness and presents a solid face, from which the quarryman may choose his dimensions, unrestricted by any conditions save his ability to handle and transport the blocks. The Egyptian obelisk or the mighty stones of Baalbec could be readily surpassed in these quarries.

The Indiana Geological Report for 1878 gives analyses of samples from different quarries along the outcrop of the formation, from White River, in Owen County, to the Ohio River, in Harrison County, showing a remarkable uniformity in its composition. All the samples show from 95 to 98 per cent carbonate of lime, which is indestructible by ordinary atmospheric influences, while ferric oxide and alumina, to which most perishable stones owe their failure, occur here only from 0.34 to 1 per cent. This is a degree of purity rarely found.

In so far as durability can be inferred from chemical analysis, the oölitic limestone gives every assurance of permanence, which is further attested by the perpendicular and unworn aspect of exposed faces along the outcrop and by its retention of tool marks after forty years of exposure in buildings. It is only slightly absorbent of moisture, is perfectly free from saltpeter or other efflorescent salts, and its high degree of elasticity enables it to resist, without injury, the otherwise destructive effects of freezing the absorbed moisture, and of unequal expansion or contraction from sudden and unequal changes of temperature.

From the report of 1878 I quote the analyses of stone taken from Owen, Monroe, and Lawrence Counties, as follows:

A number of tests of this stone were made by Gen. Gilmore, for the state-house commissioners, to determine its resistance to crushing, density, and ratio of absorption.

A specimen of oölitic limestone from Owen County, 4 miles east of Spencer, on the Indianapolis and Vincennes Railroad, gave the following result:

A cubic foot weighs 140.03 pounds, and it requires 7,500 pounds to crush a cubic inch; ratio of absorption, 1 to 30.

It will be seen from these tables that the average crushing strength or weight-sustaining power of this stone is about 135,000 pounds to the square foot.

Mr. BRETZ. Will my colleague permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. COOPER. Certainly.

Mr. BRETZ. What degree of strength is usually required to the square foot in this stone for building purposes in massive structures?

Mr. COOPER. Well Mr. Chairman, I am not a mechanical engineer nor an expert on this question, but I can say that during my investigation of this subject I have seen the statement that the weight sustained by the columns or piers that support the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral in London is only about 39,000 pounds per square foot, and in St. Peter's at Rome 33,000 pounds per square foot.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are not confined to Indiana for testimony upon this subject. I wish to read a brief extract from a work on the Building Stones of the United States by Prof. George P. Merrill, curator of geology in the United States National Museum. On pages 128 and 129, speaking of the oölitic limestone of Indiana he says:

By far the most beautiful and valuable of this stone for architectural purposes is the oölitic variety from Lawrence, Monroe, Owen, Crawford, Harrison, and Washington Counties. The supply is inexhaustible, as it lies in massive strata of 20 to 70 feet thick over an area of more than 70 square miles.

The Lawrence County stone is extensively quarried near Bedford, and is popularly known as "Bedford stone" or "Bedford oölite."

The rock is of fine texture, and is composed of small rounded concretionary grains of about the size of a grain of mustard seed, compactly cemented together by crystalline lime or calcite. The stone is soft, but tenacious (specimens having borne a pressure of 12,000 pounds per square inch), and works readily in every direction. It is therefore a great favorite for carved work, and is used more extensively for this purpose than any other of our limestones. No better example of the adaptability of the stone for this purpose can be given than the elegant mansion of Mr. C. J. Vanderbilt, on Fifth avenue, in New York City.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, that there are certain grades of limestone which are not suitable for building purposes can not be denied. I presume the same may be said of every other kind of stone in existence, but it was not necessary, neither was it fair, that in a Government publication this or any other of the valuable products of our country should be characterized by language which conveys to the public the impression that it should be subject to extreme scrutiny and handled with great caution; that certain grades and qualities of limestone are more suitable for burning into lime, or for road-making, than for building, is as certainly known to the men who have invested their fortunes in the quarries as it is to the author of this attack upon them; but in so far as this assault conveys the impression that the limestone of which I speak, and with which I am more particularly acquainted, is in any degree unsuitable for building purposes, or that it is not equal to the best, it is as false as it is unfair.

This same character of stone, the oölitic, is found in portions of England, and in speaking of it in his work on Building and Ornamental Stones of Great Britain, Sir Edward Hull, director of the geological survey of Ireland, says, on page 209 of that work:

The most important quarries, however, are those situated along the range of the Somersetshire hills, at Stinchcombe, Minchinhampton near Stroud, Bathampton, and Bath Baynton near Box, Chippenham, and Doulting. The stone is here largely worked by tunneling underground, and is of a fine grain, compact, slightly shelly, and soft when first extracted, but afterwards hardens. In color it is nearly white, passing into yellow; and is capable of receiving sculpturings to a degree of sharpness only surpassed by Caen stone. At Bathampton the upper beds for a depth of 30 feet appear to be chiefly worked. From these quarries the stone for most of the beautiful ecclesiastical structures of the west of England has been extracted, including the Abbey Church at Bath, Glastonbury Abbey Church (eleventh century), and Wells Cathedral (twelfth to fifteenth centuries); all of which are in good preservation.

It would seem that there is no urgent demand that the nation should be put upon its guard with reference to the character of a building stone which has passed through an ordeal and submitted to a test like that.

But, Mr. Chairman, injustice is done to the limestone industry of Indiana for the further reason that the extent and value of the product is greatly understated.

Mr. A. C. Benedict, writing on this subject in the New York Sun, says:

I shall now proceed to point out some of the errors of the Census bulletins, starting with the statement that the correct figures were obtained by the writer while in the employ of the geological survey of Indiana and were used by that department in a report that is in press and will soon be ready for distribution.

Bulletin No. 78 credits Indiana with producing 7,402,325 cubic feet of building stone, valued at $994,343. A general average of 13 cents a cubic foot is given, all sorts of material being lumped together. The finest oölitic and the poorest riprap macadam are lumped together. This classification of itself is sufficient to show the utter worthlessness of the work of the Census Department, for the oölitic and the stratified have nothing in common in physical structure, and it would have been nearly as correct to have classified the oölitic with the granites as with the stratified limestones.

Statistics collected by the writer show there was invested in the oölitic quarries of Indiana in 1890 the sum of $2,778,000, employing 1,748 men and producing 5,157,900 cubic feet of stone of an average value at the quarry of 20.16 cents per cubic foot, the aggregate value of which was $1,039,832.64. Mr. Porter totally ignores this important industry in his classification and tables, and devotes about two lines, hidden in the body of an obscure paragraph, to it.

I might add that Mr. Benedict is a prominent and pronounced Republican, and a stanch supporter of the Administration, barring the census.

The freight books of the Louisville, New Albany and Chicago Railway Company show that there were shipped over that road from Bedford alone in 1889 279,555,298 pounds, and in 1890 288,643,442 pounds.

And from other quarries along the same road, viz, from Salem, Stinesville, Ellettsville, Clear Creek, and Bloomington, was shipped during the year 1889 123,870,059 pounds, and in 1890 137,658,119 pounds, making the grand totals for the year 1889 403,422,337 pounds, and for 1890 426,331,561 pounds, for which there was paid in freight to that company alone $664,999.38.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire of my colleague whether in Southeastern Indiana there are not a great many quarries of stone that are regarded as of the highest value for building purposes, and used in large structures all over the country?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, that is true. I have here been calling attention to one branch of the limestone industry of Indiana only, the oölitic limestone. I have done that because it is an interest with which I am familiar, and which I represent. I have only been endeavoring to show that in the oölitic limestone quarries of Indiana alone there is more money invested, and that out of them comes more product, than has been attributed to the whole State of Indiana by these tables. It is also true, as suggested by the gentleman, that in other parts of the State there are great and extensive limestone quarries.

In the county of Jennings, represented by my colleague, Mr. BROWN, and in the county of Decatur, represented by my colleague, Mr. HOLMAN, in the county of Ripley, and also I think in the county of Shelby, about St. Paul, there are what are called stratified limestone rocks, which are very valuable for foundations and other purposes. There are also, near Greencastle, in Putnam County, quarries of close-grained, hard, silicious limestone, which is very strong and durable. I have not referred to them, because I was not so well acquainted with that branch of the subject. As I have said, my purpose was to show that in the counties which I have named there is a greater output of this product than has been credited to the whole State of Indiana, and while there are something over one hundred and seventy quarries in Indiana, I have only given you the statistics as to about a dozen of them, and from those there is a greater output than has been attributed to the whole State.

And here I might remark that every pound of this stone to which I have referred has been used for building, and was not burned into lime. I do not know of a single limekiln in the district which I represent that is in operation to-day.

Mr. HOLMAN. That stone is not adapted to lime.

Mr. COOPER. It is not adapted to lime and could not be used for that purpose. I will say further, there is in the northern part of the State, in the district represented by my colleague, Mr. MARTIN, near Huntingdon, I believe, a very superior quality of limestone in which a greater per cent of magnesia appears, which makes one of the best grades of lime made in the United States.

But the stone of which I speak is building stone and not for burning into lime. It went into buildings where it may be found in almost every State in this Union to-day. It can be seen right here in the city of Washington. It is used in the Shoreham Hotel, in the Leiter residence, in the very handsome and artistic residence of Mr. Schneider, the architect, on the corner of Eighteenth and Q streets, and in many other residences here.

Mr. Chairman, here is a partial list of buildings in which Indiana limestone has been used as an exterior material either in whole or in part:

Western Union Building, New York; Wilkes Building, New York; Smith Building, New York; Emigrants' Saving Bank, New York; New York Times Building, New York; Germania Life Insurance Office, New York; London and Lancashire Fire Insurance Office, New York; Franklin Trust Company, Brooklyn; Associated Fine Arts Society, New York; Bank of North America, New York; Lamb and Rich block, New York; Delaware and Lackawanna Building, New York; the Stokes Building, New York; Havemyer Building, New York; Prudential Building, Newark; Mail and Express Building, New York; Jewish Synagogue, New York; Mount Olivet Baptist Church, New York; Eighth Street and Second Avenue Church, New York; St. Andrew's Church, New York; All Angels' Church, New York; Congregational Church, New York; First Baptist Church, New York; Mount Calvary Church, New York; St. Michael's Church, New York; Farmers' Loan and Trust Company, New York; Georgia State-house, Atlanta; Algonquin Club, Boston; Ninety-third Street School, New York; Sixty-eighth Street School, New York; Ridge and Broome Street School, New York; fire patrol station No. 5, New York; City Hall, Chicago; State-house, Indianapolis; The Savoy, New York; Olympic Theater, St. Louis; Hotel Majestic, New York; residence of Robert Gollet, Newport; residence of James J. Van Alen, Newport; residence of C. P. Huntington, New York; residence of William K. Vanderbilt, New York; residence of Cornelius Vanderbilt, New York; Harlem Library, New York; Lincoln Building, New York; Colonial Club, New York; Dugro Hotel, New York; the Holland Hotel, New York, and the Auditorum in Chicago, two of the finest hotels in the world.

It is used in three bridges over the Ohio River at Louisville, Ky., in one at Henderson, Ky., one at Cairo, Ill., and in the new bridge over the Mississippi River at St. Louis.

It is used in more than one hundred court-houses and the Government has used it in the public buildings at Louisville, Ky.; St. Joseph and Hannibal, Mo.; Quincy, Ill.; Wichita, Kans.; Shreveport, La.; Birmingham, Ala.; Charlotte, N. C., and at Terre Haute and Indianapolis, Ind., and is now being put into Government buildings at Detroit, Jackson, and Bay City, Mich.; at Duluth, Minn., and Newark, N. J. I mention this range of territory to show its popularity with the Architect of the United States Treasury. When the people of Indiana determined to erect in the heart of her great central city a soldiers and sailors' monument to commemorate the heroism and the patriotism of her sons this stone was chosen for that purpose, not, as the author of this bulletin would have you believe, "on account of its accessibility or cheapness," but on account of its beauty and its durability, and it is being supplied from the quarries at Stinesville, in Monroe County, in my district. And when this beautiful structure is completed it will stand, Mr. Chairman, not only as a monument to the memory of our soldiers and sailors, but as a splendid exhibition of one of the chief resources of our State; and it will remain a living and enduring witness to the gross inaccuracy and willful misrepresentation of the Eleventh Census.

While, Mr. Chairman, this stone has been used in every section of our country, subject to all degrees and changes of temperature, from Boston to Denver, from Chicago to New Orleans, there can not be found a single fact to justify the foreboding and fears of the author of this remarkable bulletin.

Mr. STOCKDALE. As a matter of general information, I would like to ask the gentleman, if he has the information to give, before he gets through, whether the law provides for an expression of opinion on the part of the Superintendent of the Census as to the value of these articles? Is Mr. Porter a great architect, a great chemist, or a great builder, and by what influence did his opinion get into the Census bulletin to advertise any particular interest in this country?

Mr. COOPER. The question of the gentleman is very pertinent, Mr. Chairman, and I think before I get through I will be able to demonstrate to the members of this House that the Superintendent of the Census has been influenced more by a disposition to himself become a "boomer" than he is controlled by a purpose to fairly exhibit our resources.

Not only, Mr. Chairman, is it true that this great industry has been unjustly criticised and its interests overlooked, but, strange to say, its competitors have been given unusual preference and prominence by this census. In this same limestone bulletin will be found at the bottom of each tabular statement this note:

The States here grouped in order that the business of individual establishments may not be disclosed to the public embrace Arizona, Florida, Georgia, Oregon, South Dakota, and Wyoming.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in a Government publication like this, I am inclined to think it is not best to disclose the business of individual establishments, for if we once enter into that field there is no place to stop. Every manufacturer, merchant, and business man in the whole country would be equally entitled to space, and the work would degenerate into an advertising medium. But what can be said to excuse the conduct of an official when he recognizes and lays down a proper rule of action when it operates against an enterprise towards which he is manifestly unfriendly, and who, immediately when his interest or his feeling dictates, violates that rule in order to advance the interests of a more favored enterprise.

To show you that he has done this I only need to call your attention to Bulletins No. 45, which treats of granite, and No. 73, which treats of sandstone. I hold in my hand Bulletin No. 73, and you will see that the last page of this bulletin is entirely taken up with a list of prominent structures built of sandstone, giving in tabulated form the locality of the structure, the name and date of erection, the commercial name of the stone, and the locality of the quarry. If the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] will give his attention, I would be glad to ask him this question. I do not see him in his seat. If any other gentleman from Maine desires to pay attention, I will invite his attention to it. While this Census Bulletin No. 73 has so grossly and unjustly attacked the limestone industries of the country, another bulletin, which I hold in my hand, contains at the conclusion of it fifteen pages of advertising matter for the granite industries of this country. It is headed "Directory of granite producers," and gives the names of the firms, their post-office addresses, and the location of their quarries.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], who seems to be so well satisfied with the work of this census, and whom I believe to be a fair and honest man, if he thinks it is right that the granite-quarry men of his State should have their business advertised by the giving of their names, their post-office addresses, and the location of their quarries, so that the people throughout the United States can communicate with them as persons recognized by the Government, as persons who are qualified and fit to deal with, in that business, when in the same character of investigation an attack is made upon an interest which has its chief home in another State? I ask if it is fair and if it is honest.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Does the gentleman want an answer.

Mr. COOPER. I do.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I think it is a very proper thing to advertise as good a building material as granite, when it may not be proper to advertise and place before the public so very poor a material for building purposes as limestone.

Mr. COOPER. I am not now discussing the relative merits of the two kinds of stone, I will say to the gentleman from Maine, but I am discussing the question of the propriety of advertising either one, and I would like to know if the gentleman thinks it right and proper for the Government to advertise, at its expense, the business of any particular class or individual? The gentleman is too honest to make a reply in the affirmative.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I will answer the gentleman. I am not defending the points which he has attacked. Indeed, I have just come in, and have not had the pleasure of hearing all of his speech. He addressed himself to my colleague [Mr. DINGLEY], who I saw was not present at the time.

I do not think there is any contest between the State of Maine and his State in regard to building stone. So far as granite is concerned, it has been advertised for its goodness as a building material all over this country and every country where there are civilized people living and where they erect fine buildings.

Mr. COOPER. Why not let it stand upon its own merit, and not put an advertisement of it in a Government publication. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. I will say in reply to the gentleman that it possibly may not be any more justifiable in the Superintendent of the Census to advertise granite or marble or any other building stone than it is for the gentleman from Indiana to so thoroughly advertise the limestone of his own State.

Mr. COOPER. The difference between the Superintendent of the Census and the "gentleman" is this: That the Superintendent of the Census does not represent Indiana or any district of any State, but he is employed by the people of the whole country, and I do represent a part of the State of Indiana, whose interests have been shamefully attacked in this publication.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Does not the gentleman believe that the dignity of this House is equal to the dignity of the Census Office; and does he believe that this House should be made an advertising shop any more than the Census Office?

Mr. COOPER. I agree with the gentleman, and we have now gotten upon common ground. I do not believe that there should be any advertising given. I believe in the dignity of this House, and I also believe in the power of this House; and I invoke them both against the advertising business. It is only because this officer has prostituted a bureau of the Government to advertising the interests of the State that the gentleman in part represents that I make my protest. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me one word more?

Mr. COOPER. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. If the gentleman is correct in his position, how does he defend himself for following in this House what he claims to be the bad example of the Superintendent of the Census in another Department of this Government?

Mr. COOPER. My excuse for coming on this floor in this behalf was to protest against an injustice, not for a failure to advertise; but to protest against an attack being made against an interest in my State in the interest of an industry in his State.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I will ask the gentleman in all honesty if he is not advertising the limestone interests of his State, against which I have not a word to say, but which I hope may prosper? Is he not giving it as wide and loud and as thorough an advertisement in this House of Representatives as he could even claim that the Superintendent of the Census has given to the granite interests of Maine?

Mr. COOPER. My answer to that question is this: Emphatically "no." I have not given to the House, nor to the country, the name, nor post-office address, nor the location of a quarry of any citizen of the United States, and the Superintendent of the Census has done all these things which I have mentioned.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I think the gentleman has located them all in Indiana.

Mr. COOPER. Well, Mr. Chairman, I have been trying as best I could to set those interests right before the country; and I have not violated the rules of the House in my efforts to do so.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not charge that the Superintendent of the Census, nor those employed under him, have deliberately sold out advertising space in this Government publication, nor that they have corruptly suppressed the facts in one case and given them undue prominence in another. Such a course may have been the result of ignorance and inexperience. I prefer to think that this is the real cause; but it can not be denied that they have conferred a very great advantage upon these favored interests and inflicted a corresponding injury upon the other, for whenever the agents and representatives of the former start out in search of contracts, in which they are likely to meet the competition of the latter, they need only to arm themselves with these Government publications in order to obtain an easy victory.

For these reasons, and for many others which I have not time here to enumerate, in the name of one of the most deserving, valuable, and extensive enterprises of our country, I denounce this work as not only being of no value for the purposes for which it was designed, but as actually harmful and detrimental to the best interests of our country; and we can only hope that this same blundering and incompetent management shall have so far made itself known in its treatment of other interests that the mischief which it has attempted will carry with it its own antidote, and that therefore it will be better for an honorable enterprise to have its known hostility than to be subject to the suspicion which must follow the doubtful compliment of its commendation. [Applause.]

NOTE.—In further answer to the question of my colleague [Mr. BRETZ] I find that Gen. William B. Franklin, while captain of Topographical Engineers, United States Army, made an examination and report, dated February 24, 1860, relating to the sufficiency of the wall of the rotunda of the Capitol to support the dome. In this report he gives the following table of pressures per square foot upon the foundations of various large structures, namely:

Girard College, Philadelphia, pounds per square foot	13,440
St. Peter's, Rome, pounds per square foot	33,330
St. Paul's, London, pounds per square foot	39,450
St. Genevieve, Paris, pounds per square foot	60,000
Toulssant, Angers, pounds per square foot	90,000
New dome, United States Capitol, pounds per square foot	13,477

The pressure per square foot in pounds upon the foundation of the walls of the Washington Monument is said to be 54,560.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know from my colleague on the committee [Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa] whether any gentleman on his side of the House desires to speak?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I will make a few remarks in closing; but I understood the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] wanted to occupy some time.

Mr. SAYERS. How long does the gentleman from Iowa desire?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I do not know what you are going to bring in here. We have had stone quarries and everything else, it seems, brought in.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman will permit it, as soon as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and the gentleman from Iowa himself have spoken, I will ask the committee to close general debate and proceed to consider the bill by items.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I understood the gentleman from Illinois was going to make some observations.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Then I will follow him for about fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized a gentleman on the right for nearly an hour and would feel constrained to recognize a gentleman on the left.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. That is entirely satisfactory to us, and we will not embarrass the Chair in that respect.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the committee long. I desire to call attention of the committee to the fact that the Census Office, it seemed to me, has devoted more time than was necessary in preparing statistics on unimportant matters, and has neglected those statistics which were of the most interest and of the most importance to the country. Soon after my appointment as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, I addressed a communication to the Superintendent of the Census, requesting to be furnished with the statistics of 1890 in reference to certain subjects, particularly manufactures. I have before me a letter from the Acting Superintendent of the Census, dated January 2, which is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE.
Washington, D. C., January 2, 1892.

SIR: This office is in receipt of your favor of December 31, 1891, requesting certain data relating to manufactures.

I have the honor to inform you in reply that it is impracticable, at the present time, to comply with your request. The schedules relating to various productive industries have not yet been examined for tabulation, and some months must necessarily elapse before the information is ready for publication, the date of which will depend upon the promptness with which Congress makes an additional appropriation to enable me to complete this branch of census work.

Your memoranda are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

A. F. CHILDS,
Acting Superintendent of Census.

Hon. W. M. SPRINGER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

I also requested some data upon special subjects, and to that request I received the following reply:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, CENSUS OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., January 15, 1892.

SIR: This office is in receipt of your letter of January 14, 1892, requesting a report on the woolen industries, mixed textiles, and men's and women's clothing, for the census of 1890, similar to that published in volume 2 of Manufactures for the Tenth Census.

In reply I have the honor to advise you that the data in regard to the woolen industries have been tabulated and are now in course of examination to obtain the totals you require, and I hope to be able to furnish you the same within the next sixty days.

It is not the present intention of this office to publish data for a distinct class of textile manufactures under the head of "Mixed textiles," as contained in the report for the Tenth Census. The returns for such establishments will be included in the reports on the manufacture of wool, cotton, and silk, respectively, the component product of chief value determining the class to which the report belongs.

I regret to be compelled to inform you that no examination or tabulation has been made of the clothing industry, and it is impossible at present to state when the data for that industry can be furnished. If Congress shall make the additional appropriation requested by this office available at an early date, it will then be practicable to push forward the work of the division of manufactures as rapidly as possible.

Very respectfully,

A. F. CHILDS,
Acting Superintendent of Census.

Hon. WILLIAM M. SPRINGER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Since then I have been informed orally by the gentleman in charge of the statistics of manufactures that the subjects mentioned in this letter will be reported upon within a very few days. I call attention to this, because the early publication of the statistics of these industries is a matter of very great importance, and I had hoped that the Census Office would have been able to furnish Congress with the figures at the very beginning of this session.

I hold in my hand a printed pamphlet containing an address on the Eleventh Census delivered by Mr. Porter, the Superintendent, before the American Statistical Association in Boston on October 16, 1891. The address sets forth the general scope of the work of the Census Office, and at the end is printed what is called an "appendix," giving a list of the bulletins that have been published, or that were to be published by the time of the convening of Congress in December last. If gentlemen will examine this list of bulletins they will find that many of them relate to subjects of trifling importance, although their preparation must have involved a great deal of time and labor.

Here are some of these subjects: Under the head of "Agriculture," for instance, I find "Viticulture," "Truck farming," "Commercial floriculture," "Irrigation in Arizona," "Irrigation in New Mexico," "Irrigation in Utah," "Irrigation in Wyoming," and so on. But there are only four or five reports, or of four or five States, in reference to farm mortgages, a subject of the greatest importance.

Then we have very detailed reports in regard to Alaska, the population, wealth, and resources of that far-away portion of our domain. Then we have statistics of the churches of the country, reported in the utmost detail. I might go on reading the titles of the subjects upon which these bulletins have been prepared, and if gentleman would examine this address they would see how unnecessary it was to spend so much of the people's money and so much valuable time in preparing these statistics to the disregard of others more important.

I will not read further from these headings, but will simply call attention to the fact that nowhere in this list of bulletins are to be found those relating to manufactures, except in very limited degree. I want to call attention also to the volumes which I hold in my hand, six in number, and which have been issued by the Census Office during the past year. Gentlemen can see for themselves the size of these volumes. That they have been prepared at a great expenditure of time and labor will be seen by an examination of the volumes themselves. As I open one of them at random, I find, for instance, this: "The Cumberland Presbyterian Church," and then a number of church organizations, with the seating capacity of the halls, the value of the church property, number of communicants, number of members, and so on; all these matters set forth in great and elaborate detail.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he does not think the subject of churches is a proper subject for the Census Bureau to present us statistics upon?

Mr. SPRINGER. A very proper subject. I am not complaining of that.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. And if the Bureau touches that subject at all does not the gentleman believe that the work ought to be done in a systematic, scientific, and exhaustive way?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly. I am not complaining of that. I am simply calling attention to the fact that it is much more important for us here to be put in possession at the earliest day possible of the statistics of manufactures than it is to know all these minute details of these church organizations.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman pardon me for a suggestion at this point?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. The Superintendent of the Census was questioned upon that subject when he was before the subcommittee and he explained that the statistics of these minor subjects, where the facts are few and simple so that they can be arranged and prepared for publication by almost any class of clerks, necessarily come forward early, while the more important and difficult subjects, especially the industrial statistics, which require to be handled by expert clerks, involve necessarily a great deal more work and consequent delay; but he assured the subcommittee that the statistics in relation to agriculture and manufactures would be placed right at the front, and the reports laid before Congress at the earliest possible day.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am very glad indeed to have that statement, and I hope that the Superintendent of the Census will put his force to work upon those more important matters and let us have "a rest" in relation to the statistics of paupers in almshouses, classified by age and sex, and other unimportant matters upon which so much time and labor have already been expended. This bulletin which I hold in my hand (Bulletin No. 154) goes into the details of the ages and sexes of the paupers in every almshouse in the United States. These figures may be important to some gentlemen who are studying vital statistics, but to the Congress of the United States, which is now engaged in legislating upon great industrial subjects, they are of far less importance than the statistics of manufactures would be.

In regard to farm mortgages, the whole number of States reported upon up to this time is five, Alabama, Iowa, Kansas, Illinois, and Tennessee. This list embraces only four, but the statistics for Illinois have since been published. Five States, then, have been reported upon in relation to farm mortgages.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him

I will state that the Superintendent of the Census told us that it would require a deficiency appropriation of from $350,000 to $500,000 to complete that work. Instead of $1,000,000 there may be required $1,500,000; and certainly $1,350,000 will be required in all.

Mr. SPRINGER. Did the Superintendent inform the committee at what time we shall probably have the printed reports on that subject?

Mr. SAYERS. The committee was informed that with a certain appropriation the entire work of the census, with the exception of the printing of the names of the Union soldiers, could be completed within the present year; with another appropriation it could be completed within the coming year, and with the appropriation as now made, and the employment of the present official force, amounting to about 850 in all, it would probably take six or eight months of the year 1893 to complete the entire work of the census, and have it ready for distribution. In addition to that, the Superintendent informed the committee that no provision had been made for the printing of the volume which would contain the names of the Union soldiers, and that an additional appropriation would have to be made for that purpose.

Mr. SPRINGER. In what the gentleman has just said did he refer to the fiscal year or to the calendar year?

Mr. SAYERS. To the calendar year.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I understand the gentleman to say that the reports or bulletins in reference to farm mortgages will not be published until the latter part of the present calendar year.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir. My understanding in regard to the printing is that there is a sufficient amount on hand to complete all the printing, except the volumes containing the names of the Union soldiers.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. That is, the amount will be sufficient on the assumption that the same number of volumes will be printed as were printed of the Tenth Census?

Mr. SAYERS. That is so.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. But the amount required will depend on the number of volumes which Congress shall order.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is to say, the money now on hand will be enough for printing the preliminary supply of volumes—not for printing the volumes which may be authorized by Congress for distribution. I desire to suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. SAYERS] that he print in the RECORD in connection with the communication from Mr. Porter the estimate of the cost of the printing.

Mr. SAYERS. I will print it in connection with my remarks at this point, so that it may be more intelligible. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to print in the RECORD the statement made to the subcommittee having charge of this bill regarding the cost of printing.

There being no objection, leave to print was granted.

The statement is as follows:

In regard to preliminary printing and binding, for which there has been appropriated $800,000, which has been used to pay for all the printing of the census, including schedules, circulars, and bulletins. Of this amount there remained December 31, 1891, $175,000. Out of this has also been paid the running expenses of the printing office. I believe that the balance remaining of this appropriation will be sufficient to complete the census work in this direction, and that no further appropriation for this purpose will be made. For the final printing there has been appropriated the sum of $250,000, of which there remains at the Government Printing Office to the credit of the Census Office the sum of about $230,000. This appropriation was intended to defray the cost of printing the Compendium, the Digest, and certain volumes of the final reports authorized to be printed by the act making the appropriation. As I informed the committee, the cost of the printing will depend largely on the number of copies ordered, as will be seen from the following tables:

50,000 copies Digest (1 volume)	$5,200
25,000 copies Compendium (2 volumes)	64,200
5,000 copies final reports (15 volumes)	113,000
5,000 copies Statistical Atlas (1 volume)	100,000
	282,400
100,000 copies of Compendium (2 volumes)	260,000
12,000 copies final reports (15 volumes)	270,000
20,000 copies final reports (extra), population and manufactures (3 volumes)	90,000
12,000 copies Veterans (8 volumes)	144,000
12,000 copies Statistical Atlas (1 volume)	240,000
	1,004,000

The above tables show, as well as I am able to present it, the probable cost of printing the report of the Eleventh Census on the basis of the smallest possible number, and also on the basis of the number printed at the time of the Tenth Census.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas (if he has information on which to answer the question) when we may expect the complete reports as to farm mortgages?

Mr. SAYERS. We have no information as to that; but I repeat that, according to the statement of the Superintendent of the Census (my colleagues on the subcommittee will correct me if I make any mistake), he will be able with a certain force, say 850 persons, to have the entire work of the census, including that relating to farms and farm mortgages, completed during the latter part of 1893; if we increase the force to say 950, he can have the work completed sooner; and if we increase the force to a still greater number, the entire work can be completed within the present year. With reference to the subject of manufactures, the Superintendent of the Census informed us that so far as concerns cotton and woolen fabrics, he will be able to furnish the bulletins on those two subjects within the next thirty or forty days. As to other manufactures he has given us no information directly.

Mr. SPRINGER. What I wished was to express my desire, and I believe in this matter I express the desire of every member of the House, for the early publication of the statistics relating to manufactures and agriculture. These are the subjects upon which especially the people desire information, and they desire it at the very earliest practicable time. The data upon which these bulletins are to be prepared has been in the Census Office for eighteen months.

Mr. RAY. Would it not be within the province of the House to require this information to be published at once?

Mr. SPRINGER. I think so, and I requested the subcommittee having charge of this bill to provide, in connection with the appropriation, that a portion of it should be devoted to the preparation and publication of statistics in relation to manufactures, and another portion to the preparation and publication of the statistics in regard to agriculture, one-third of the fund being devoted to each of these purposes. But the subcommittee thought it best not to interfere with the internal workings of the Bureau, but to leave the matter to the discretion of the Superintendent. I do not wish to antagonize the committee in reference to matters especially within their province and upon which they are better informed than I am. I simply express my desire, and that, as I believe, of every other member, that the Superintendent furnish us the bulletins upon these subjects at the very earliest time which may be practicable.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, and upon the subject he has just alluded to, I would state that the subcommittee on deficiencies have carefully considered that proposition, and they thought it would be exceedingly unwise to subdivide this appropriation of $200,000, for the reason that the whole work of the census is being carried on simultaneously, some portion in one state of completion, some in another, and another part in a more advanced state.

We were further informed that in the course of thirty days he would be able to take from thirty-five to fifty employés from the work on population and add them to manufactures; and also that in about the same length of time a like number from another branch of the census could be taken and added to the same work on manufactures.

We believed it to be sound policy that the legislative branch of the Government should not in any manner interfere with the administrative branch in these details, because if anything should happen by which the work was delayed Congress would be held responsible for it. We concluded that it was best, under all the circumstances, in the matter of taking the census, that the entire responsibility should rest upon the Superintendent, and we agreed that the appropriation should be in full rather than subdivided to be allotted to either this or that branch of the service.

Mr. PICKLER. That is right.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has stated that those who sought a report upon farm mortgages were dissatisfied with the result of that investigation. I was one of those who favored the special act passed requiring a report to be made upon these mortgages, and from what I have seen of the reports—only five States having been reported upon up to this time—I think the action of Congress in requiring reports to be made by the Census Bureau has been more than vindicated; in fact, I am exceedingly gratified to have the information, and I think it of a very useful character. It establishes the fact which those who sought the statistics believed to exist, namely, that agriculture has not flourished during the past decade as it should under proper fiscal conditions. I believe that the farm mortgages show that the agriculturists of this country have labored under great exactions and burdens, and this information is useful to them and to the whole country. It is the best expenditure, in my judgment, that the Government has yet made in connection with the census.

Mr. ENLOE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will yield for an inquiry.

Mr. ENLOE. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois if it is not his opinion, so far as the interrogatories in reference to the administration of the Census Office are concerned and criticisms upon them, that it would be wiser for us to wait for an investigation by a committee of the House, and, if necessary, that that investigation should be had, and let us come to a vote on this bill without further delay? I ask him if he does not think this would be better than to spend time here criticising the administration of the Census Office? Had we not better wait and investigate the matter first?

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman from Tennessee means that we should not pass this bill until an investigation is had, I should say no. I think the appropriation should be passed at once.

Mr. ENLOE. Then let us have a vote at once.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection.

Mr. ENLOE. I call for a vote. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. DINGLEY. I promised to yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I want to say by way of appendix to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COOPER], that if any of the members of the House desire to examine this Indiana limestone of which Mr. Cooper has been talking, they will find a building at the northwest corner of Twelfth and G streets, in this city, in which this stone is used, the new building now being erected by the Ohio National Bank. A hint to the wise is sufficient. I have examined the dictionary to find the definition of limestone, and I want to read the definition for the benefit of my friend from Webster's Unabridged Dictionary:

> Limestone.—A kind of stone, consisting largely or chiefly of carbonate of lime, from which lime is obtained by the expulsion of its carbonic acid.

So you will see that the definition of limestone is a kind of stone from which lime is obtained. It is the stone out of which lime is made. But the kind of stone they are exporting from Indiana that goes under the general name of limestone, the kind they are using for building purposes, will not do for making lime. You can not make lime out of it. I know this to be true, from some experience I have had myself. I owned some limestone land in Indiana at one time, but unfortunately I sold it before I knew how valuable this kind of limestone was for building purposes.

The trouble, therefore, with the gentleman from Indiana is that he did not understand the kind of stone the Census Bureau was considering when the report to which he takes exception was made. There are different kinds of limestone, just as there are different kinds of sandstone. You all know how many kinds of sandstone there are, some of which are good for building purposes, while some will not do at all. It is a general name for stone of a particular character, and there are many kinds of it under the generic name. The words limestone and sandstone are a kind of general terms, embracing many varieties. This is the explanation that occurs to me, and I give it for what it is worth. I have no doubt that Mr. Porter can explain it fully.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him just there?

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. I would be very glad to do so, if I had the time, but the gentleman knows I have only eight minutes.

I desire, now, Mr. Chairman, to speak on another subject. Some remarks have been made in regard to the character of the men employed in the Census Bureau. It is certainly well known to many members of this House that the clerical force appointed by Superintendent Porter was examined by a competent board of examiners before they received permanent appointments. I know personally that this is true, and I am well acquainted with one of the members of that board, a very excellent gentleman, who had been a prominent teacher in Ohio for many years. He served on the board for a long time, and I am perfectly satisfied that his examinations were honestly and carefully made.

I know, too, that some of those who were examined were rejected, for one of them was from my own district; and I know, too, that this rejection was final. I believed that the examination was fair and just, and hence I acquiesced in the result without a murmur. I met one of the Civil Service Commissioners at Mr. Porter's office at one time and he seemed very happy, and after he went out I was informed that he had called to compliment Mr. Porter on his satisfactory methods of examining applicants for office. Whether this was his errand or not does not matter now, but in view of the intimations which have been made as to the incompetency of the clerical force and employés of the Bureau, it is proper to call attention to the way in which they were chosen, for I am satisfied that they were selected as carefully as the Civil Service Bureau would have done if the work had been committed to them.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say another thing, and that is this, that the Republican side of this House is not responsible for the cost of this census. The scope and extent of this Eleventh Census was determined by the last Democratic Congress. The law under which this census was taken was passed by the Fiftieth Congress, and the bill was prepared by the late S. S. Cox, of New York, who gave more attention to this subject than was ever given probably by any other member of Congress. I was a member of the Census Committee in that Congress, and I know that the gentleman from New York, who was then its chairman, spent a great deal of time in the preparation of the census bill, and it was reported to the House as it was presented to the committee, with a single amendment. That was the amendment requiring the soldiers of the late war to be enumerated. Mr. Cox designed that the Eleventh Census should embrace a wide field and furnish a great deal of valuable information, and this is why it costs so much.

The immense work which this census embraces could not be otherwise than expensive.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] may take the credit of this mortgage business. The credit of that million-dollar bill belongs to the Democratic party. I was chairman of a subcommittee to which this matter was referred, and we had the matter under consideration for more than a month. At first we were disposed to report against this expenditure of a million or more dollars of money to ascertain the indebtedness of the country, but the petitions came pouring in so numerously and so voluminously that we changed our minds and reported in favor of it, and I think every petition was presented from the Democratic side of the House, and every man who came before the committee to urge its passage was a Democrat. It was a Democratic demand, and whether it cost a million or two millions of dollars, to the Democratic side of the House belongs the responsibility of incurring that expense.

Another thing, and this is all I desire to say. Several matters came before the Census Committee of the Fifty-first Congress, involving the character of the work done by the Superintendent of the Census. We spent several weeks investigating the controversy in regard to the census in the city of New York. They tried to discredit the taking of the census of New York, and claimed that injustice had been done them, and all that. Papers were brought before the committee. All kinds of testimony was produced and the work of the Census Bureau was largely reviewed by the committee. There was no hesitancy on the part of the Superintendent in answering any question or producing any papers, and I want to say here, and I think all the members of the Census Committee, both Republicans and Democrats, will agree with me, that these investigations showed the good faith and the integrity and the ability of the Census Bureau, including the clerks and officials as well as the Superintendent.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STONE].

Mr. STONE of Kentucky. I have listened with a great deal of patience to this discussion, in order to try to find out, if I could, why the appropriation recommended by the committee should not be made, and I found, through all the discussion, that no reason has been given why the appropriation should not be made; but gentlemen have employed the time in finding fault with the census and the Superintendent of the Census. The gentleman from Indiana finds fault with the Superintendent because the stone quarries in his district or State are not reported. The gentleman from Illinois, the distinguished leader of the Fifty-second Congress [Mr. SPRINGER], finds fault because forsooth he says unimportant subjects have been reported upon. The first unimportant subject that he mentions is the subject of agriculture.

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, no.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Religion.

Mr. STONE of Kentucky. Agriculture; and you will find the Reporter's notes will show that the first unimportant subject the gentleman mentions was the subject of agriculture. That is the occupation of the people of this country, upon which all the balance rests. Without agriculture we would not be here. Then again he complains of the statistics reported as to church organizations, or religion. That is the most important subject with which we upon this terrestrial globe have to deal. Unimportant! Why, sir, if you have your anchor fixed beyond the skies, where it should be—and I hope you have—you might turn to the balance of mankind and call their attention to the importance of the subject.

But, Mr. Chairman, all the censure seems to be cast at the Superintendent of the Census. Now, the Superintendent of the Census is a Republican, and I am a Democrat; but this is not a question of politics. It is a question of finding a correct census enumeration and report of the statistics of this country. But these gentlemen have not gone to the bottom of the subject. The Superintendent of the Census, as I believe, has been an earnest, faithful, active, and energetic worker, and he has desired to make a correct and perfect census of the country, as required of him under the law. But if there are faults, why have they arisen?

That is the question for us to find out. Do not stand here and abuse the Superintendent, but let us go to the bottom of the system. And where is the bottom? Why, the bottom of this whole matter is with the gentlemen who have been selected throughout the country to make the enumeration and take the statistics. Now, as to the question of manufactures, everybody in this House who has kept any trace of this matter at all knows that the gentlemen who are appointed to take the statistics of manufactures were given a long time in which to do it. In the district which I have the honor to represent the Superintendent of the Census asked me to name a man for that purpose. I named a man fully competent to make the enumeration, and the statistics in regard to manufactures in my own district have been perfect and complete, but they were not made in time so that the bulletin in regard to them could be printed and reported to this Congress.

Mr. FITHIAN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. STONE of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. FITHIAN. Did the gentleman name any other appointees in that office?

Mr. STONE of Kentucky. No, sir; but I am coming to that subject. Now, sir, what I said awhile ago fully relieves the Superintendent of the Census. Whereas the law requires the Superintendent to appoint the enumerators throughout the entire country, he can not name them without assistance. Where did he get that assistance? He got it, Mr. Chairman, from the Republican members of Congress, and the Republican referees in Democratic districts. That is where he got it. If the Administration had been Democratic, and the Superintendent had been a Democrat, he would have obtained his information as to enumerators from Democratic members of Congress and Democratic referees in Republican districts

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STONE of Kentucky. I ask the gentleman from Maine if he will give me two more minutes?

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. STONE of Kentucky. Now, when this investigation that has been set on foot, or attempted to be set on foot, is put into operation, those gentlemen will find, if they go into the records of the Census Office, an amount of incompetency that is perfectly astonishing. Is the Superintendent responsible? I tell you he is not; but the men who named the enumerators are responsible. Whether or not the Superintendent is responsible is not the question. This question is as to the appropriation. I can tell you what the result of that investigation will be. You will find that the Superintendent of this Census has done more, has been more vigorous, more earnest, more rapid, and more efficient in the execution of the trust imposed upon him than any Superintendent of the Census this country has ever had before. Look at the results. Only a few days ago we were notified of a number of publications of the Tenth Census only now ready for distribution; yet the committee on appropriations inform the House that the evidence is that the work of this census will probably be completed in the year 1892, except the publication of the names of the ex-Federal soldiers.

As I said before, I have sufficiently investigated the result of this work to convince me that the present Superintendent of the Census has been efficient, earnest, and has tried to render faithful service to the country in the position in which he was placed.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa rose.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me to correct the gentleman from Kentucky in regard to one statement he made?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I will yield to the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Kentucky assumed that I regarded agriculture as an unimportant matter. I stated that under the head of agriculture I had been furnished with the report on viticulture, truck farming, commercial floriculture, irrigation in Arizona and other of the far Western States, and that these were the unimportant subjects with reference to agriculture which had been reported upon, and that we had no report upon the matter of home and farm mortgages that Congress had asked by special legislation.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I will have but few words to say, in addition to what the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has said, in regard to this matter. As to the necessity for the appropriation, all are agreed, both as to the first and second clause; and the discussion which has been had here has taken a range entirely aside from what is contemplated in the appropriation bill. Reference has been made to the punching machine, and to the statement of Mr. Porter that he thought he had money enough, a statement made sometime in the summer. These are questions that have no bearing whatever upon this appropriation bill. But, since they have been referred to, I want to say that the fact is as shown in this debate, that he had money enough, with the printing fund, although they came out of different funds. Upon that subject he might change his mind in two or three months, or in two or three weeks. With regard to these electric punching machines, I think that they have probably saved this Government thousands of dollars.

Now, I am not going into this stone-quarry business. My friend from Indiana [Mr. COOPER] has had ample opportunity to speak on that subject. I know nothing about it, and have not seen the bulletin. The gentleman who had charge of that division will have to fight it out with him; but it is not a question here.

But there is a point I wish to call attention to, and that is, the effort that has been made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to make it appear that reports on trifling matters have been brought up to date by the bulletins, while the important matters, such as those pertaining to manufactures and to agriculture, have been kept back. It was delicately done. The fine Italian hand of the leader of the House was shown in his discussion of it. But whether it is done with the justice that should characterize that discussion, I will leave it to this House and the country to decide.

Now, if the gentleman is as familiar with this matter as I think he ought to be and must be, he knows that the branches of the Census Office whose work demands the most labor and attention are the very ones he named, and whose reports are not yet complete. As my friend himself has stated, the statistics in regard to manufactures and agriculture are the most important to be compiled and prepared. They will become the statistics that will enter into the political battle fields of the future. We understand it perfectly well, and so does the gentleman from Illinois. No careless preparation should be made, or can be made of those statistics. The question to which our attention should be directed, is the question suggested by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES]. Has the Census Office been giving its full proper attention to, and is it now employing sufficient force upon, that work?

Now, it will be remembered that the original scheme of the census, as adopted in the Fiftieth Congress under the leadership of our late friend, Mr. Cox, did not contemplate taking statistics of farm-mortgage indebtedness. There was nothing of that kind in the original scheme prepared by the Superintendent of the Census, and I have no doubt that some of the original blanks were thrown aside, as was stated by some gentleman here. This present scheme involved a different kind of work, and to-day the field work in regard to farm mortgages is not finished.

Mr. SPRINGER. Not finished?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Not finished. There are men yet in the field doing work in that line. So, too, with reference to the statistics of manufactures. In past censuses the taking of the statistics of manufactures has been left to the ordinary enumerators, but the present Superintendent, utilizing the experience of the past, has employed in the large cities men of special qualifications for taking such statistics, men having an expert knowledge of manufactures.

Now, the next question is this: Are the data thus prepared being utilized? The Superintendent assured us, when we examined him in relation to this subject, that he was utilizing every man that could be profitably employed upon these two lines, farm mortgages and manufactures, which require the most skillful employés in the Census Office. It was suggested to him that he might recall some of those who had been furloughed, but he said that he had every man employed upon the work now that could profitably be employed upon it. So that to-day we stand with the uncontradicted statement of the Superintendent that the work is being expedited as much as possible, that the most skillful clerks are employed upon it, and that in a very short time we shall have, in the form of bulletins, the fruits of their work. That is all that I desire to say in this discussion.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed and that we proceed with the reading of the bill by sections.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, namely:

ELEVENTH CENSUS.

For salaries and necessary expenses for continuing the work of compiling the results of the Eleventh Census, $200,000.

SUPERINTENDENT OF FREE DELIVERY.

To pay the salary of the superintendent of free delivery in the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, $3,000.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

For subsistence of the Sioux, as per agreement ratified by act of Congress approved February 28, 1877; being for the service of the fiscal year 1892, $115,514.17, or so much thereof as may be necessary; and the sum of $28,400, which remains of the allotment the establishment of substations from the appropriation for subsistence of the Sioux Indians for the fiscal year 1892, shall also be used for the purchase of subsistence for said Sioux Indians: Provided, That hereafter the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall report to Congress the names of all employés under the supervision and direction of the Indian Bureau, under what law said employés are appointed, the amount of compensation paid to each, and the services rendered by them.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs was before us this morning and gave us the information that unless——

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I wish to reserve all points of order upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is rather late to make the point of order after debate has begun. However, the Chair will not press that point if no other gentleman does. The rule, however, is that a point of order should be made before the debate opens.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Well, the debate has not gone far. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Texas does not make the point, the Chair will not urge it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I wish to reserve all points of order against any point of order that is now being made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair remarked to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] that his point came too late if the objection was insisted upon.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I was rising to address the Chair when the gentleman from Texas began.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that I do not think there is anything in this amendment that he will object to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] makes a point of order upon the amendment, against which point the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] reserves all points of order.

Mr. DINGLEY. What is the point of order made by the gentleman from Mississippi?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman states that he desires to reserve all points of order.

Mr. DINGLEY. Against this paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. Against this amendment.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. My point of order is against the amendment, not against the bill.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I trust the Chair will require the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] to state his point of order now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair remarked to the gentleman [Mr. HOOKER] when he rose to make the point of order, that it came too late, inasmuch as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] had entered upon debate.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Well, the gentleman had not said more than a word or two. [Laughter.] It is a very technical form of objection that the Chair is presenting.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is here to enforce technical objections if they are made. The debate had commenced and the gentleman from Texas had spoken a sentence or two when the gentleman from Mississippi rose, and the Chair felt constrained to call attention to the point in order that business might proceed properly.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I only desired to call the attention of the committee to the rule which we have adopted, and, as to this amendment, to raise the question whether it could be put upon an appropriation bill, as it did not seem to be in the line of economy and retrenchment. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs was before our committee, or before a portion of it, this morning, and gave us information that unless this appropriation was made at once he would have to cut short the rations due to the Sioux Indians under our treaty stipulation. It has been contended that the difficulty that we had with this tribe of Indians last year and the year before was due to the fact that the Government had not complied with its treaty stipulations in this respect. Upon the statement made by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs I have no hesitancy in recommending this committee to adopt this amendment. It is far better to feed these Indians in accordance with our treaty stipulations, than to have to go to war to force them into obedience after they have been starved into rebellion. I am quite sure that no gentleman on this floor will insist that this amendment should not be adopted. Therefore I will not occupy further time in discussing it. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. What has become of the point of order which I made upon the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thought the point of order was made too late.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYERS. I move that the Committee of the Whole now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it pass as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. RICHARDSON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5399) making appropriations to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the expenses of the Eleventh Census and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, and to recommend that it be passed as amended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ENLOE. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole (Mr. RICHARDSON in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of business on the Private Calendar.

LOUISA Q. LOVELL AND OTHERS.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the first bill on the Private Calendar.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1086) for the relief of Louisa Q. Lovell and others.

Mr. ENLOE. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS], who introduced this bill, is, I believe, not in his seat; but I suppose, as the bill simply proposes to refer a case to the Court of Claims, there will be no objection to its passage. I ask that the bill and report be read.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claims of Louisa Q. Lovell, Antonio Q. Lovell, Rosalie Q. Duncan, F. Q. Ogden, and F. Q. Ogden, trustee, as set forth in their petition filed in the Court of Claims November 23, 1871, for wood and use of the real estate therein described, be and the same is hereby, referred to said court, to hear, try, and determine the same according to law and equity, as if the same was not barred by any statute of limitation or jurisdiction, and to render judgment for the fair and reasonable value of the wood and the rental of said premises while the same were under the control of the United States officers; and the evidence heretofore taken and filed in said court in cause numbered 6394, which was dismissed for want of jurisdiction, may be read in evidence on the trial of said claim, together with such further evidence as said claimants or the United States may take in relation to said claim.

The report of the Committee on War Claims (by Mr. ENLOE) was read as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1086) for the relief of Louisa Q. Lovell and others, submit the following report:

The history of the claim is set forth in the House report from the Committee on War Claims, first session, Fifty-first Congress, which is appended as a part of this report.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

[House Report No. 790, Fifty-first Congress, first session.]

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1341) for the relief of Louisa Q. Lovell and others, report as follows:

The facts out of which this bill for relief arises will be found stated in House report from the Committee on War Claims of the Fiftieth Congress, a copy of which is hereto appended for information.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

[House Report No. 2395, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

This is a claim of the heirs of Gen. John A. Quitman for rent of the plantations belonging to them, situated in Warren County, Miss., known as "Pahhgra," plantation and Lake Place, for the year 1865.

The evidence shows that Louisa Q. Lovell, Antonio Q. Lovell, Rosalia Q. Duncan, F. Q. Ogden, and Eliza T. Ruth were the owners of said plantations on and before January 1, 1865, and had leased them to Alexander Warwick for the year 1865.

That in the month of January, 1865, the United States Government took possession of said premises and used the same for the purposes of the freedmen under its charge, and kept and used them until March, 1866, and cut from the premises and used 1,000 cords of wood. Said places were rented to Alexander Warwick for the year 1864.

The claimants allege that they were always loyal to the United States Government.

They filed their petition in the Court of Claims November 23, 1871, and it was dismissed for want of jurisdiction in 1875.

The claimants desire to have their cause tried before the Court of Claims, and the committee are of opinion they ought to have that privilege, and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I understand, from what I can gather from the reading of this bill and report, they have found some persons down in Mississippi who were loyal to the Federal Government during the war. I was in that country a good deal during that period and I never heard of such persons. If they were loyal, they ought to have been in the Federal Army testifying to their loyalty in the ranks. As I understand the bill, its purpose is to give to these "loyal" people there and in that country a case in court. Twenty-five years after the war a great many persons in the South who were no more loyal that the rest of us are now willing to swear to their loyalty that they may get pay for their losses.

Several MEMBERS. All are loyal now.

Mr. KILGORE. It is profitable now to claim to have been loyal then. It was not profitable to assert their loyalty then. But the bill undertakes to give to these people a cause of action——

Mr. ENLOE. Which people?

Mr. KILGORE. The claimants.

Mr. ENLOE. Which claimants?

Mr. KILGORE. The Lovells, the beneficiaries in the bill. It undertakes to give to these people a cause of action which I presume has been barred for twelve or fifteen years; six years, I believe, is the usual rule in the courts of the United States. It revives their claim and gives them a cause of action which they could not have except by legislation such as is proposed by this bill. It sends their case to the Court of Claims and vests that court with authority to hear and determine the matter according to the rules of law and equity and to render judgment final and conclusive.

Mr. BOATNER. Will my friend yield for a question?

Mr. KILGORE. Yes, I am very glad to do so.

Mr. BOATNER. If these people were loyal during the war, which for the sake of argument must be taken for granted, and if the Government occupied or used their property for its own purposes, which for the sake of argument must also be taken for granted, how have they had any opportunity to obtain from the Government payment of what the Government owes them?

Mr. KILGORE. Well, sir, that question is predicated on the supposition that these persons were loyal. I say I do not believe they were loyal, I do not care what the proof may be.

Mr. BOATNER. Then if they were not loyal they can not recover; they must prove their loyalty or their action will fail.

Mr. KILGORE. But they can prove their loyalty; they swear to it themselves, and get their neighbors to do the same thing. But you will excuse me if I say I do not believe one word of their testimony. It is not true, and this kind of legislation simply operates to encourage fraud and perjury, and it ought not to be indulged in. I can not believe that this House ought to pass this bill.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS], who is the author of this bill, is not in his seat at present. But when it was called up I supposed there could be no objection on the part of any member of this House to refer the bill to the Court of Claims, where the question of loyalty and the question of fact—the taking of the property—must be determined before the claim can be recovered. That is all this bill proposes, and I therefore ask that it be put upon its passage.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that there is another objection to the passage of the bill as I read it. It not only refers this claim to the Court of Claims, but it instructs the court to render judgment for certain things.

Now, it does not seem to me that that is placing it within the discretion of the court at all. It is the House deciding here whether these parties are loyal and that the facts are as stated in the claim. It instructs the court to render judgment for the value of the wood taken and the rental of the property.

Mr. ENLOE. Of course the court must first find that the parties are loyal.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think that there is any such provision in the bill. As I understand it, it instructs the court to render judgment.

Mr. ENLOE. Of course, to render judgment after the finding of certain facts.

Mr. BUTLER. No, not at all. I would like to have the bill again reported, Mr. Chairman. There is certainly a misapprehension as to what it contains. I have no recollection of having heard what the gentleman from Tennessee claims is in the bill.

The bill was again reported.

Mr. ENLOE. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BUTLER. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. ENLOE. I only want a moment to make a suggestion with a view to saving time.

Mr. BUTLER. Not to come out of my time.

A MEMBER. You have an hour.

Mr. BUTLER. I was not aware that I had so long a time. Of course, I am willing to allow the gentleman to make a suggestion, as I shall not need a quarter of that time.

Mr. ENLOE. I simply wish to make this statement to the gentleman. He will see that this is a reference directly to that court to determine, according to the rules of law, the questions submitted to them in this bill, and if he understands anything of the nature of the act under which this is referred he will remember that the first fact for that court to ascertain is that the claimant was loyal. After the ascertainment of that fact the next question to be determined is, was the property taken?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I am not questioning the understanding of the gentleman as to what he thinks is in the bill, but it seems that it provides for restoring jurisdiction or conferring jurisdiction upon this court to try the case according to the law and evidence already taken so far as they apply. Now, the court did not have jurisdiction before, but this gives them jurisdiction; and I think the statement is clear and unquestioned in the bill that the court shall render judgment for the value of the wood and for the rental of the premises, not conditioned upon anything else contained in the bill. It goes on to say that such and such evidence heretofore before the court may be used; but it directs positively, as I understand the meaning of language, that the court shall render judgment. It does not say "if it finds the fact of loyalty," or if it finds this or that to be true, but the clause standing by itself is clearly an instruction to the court to render judgment.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] a question in regard to this claim. Does not this bill take the claim out of the jurisdiction of what is known as the Bowman act and carry it beyond its provisions?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly; it was intended for that purpose.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Then on what ground can the passage of this bill be justified, while all of these other claims from the Southern States, standing on the same footing, are required to be passed upon by the Court of Claims, as to the loyaly of the claimant first, and as to the justice of the claim, where the property or the goods were taken for the necessary use of the Army?

Under the Bowman act many of these claims are pending in the Court of Claims, and the court is not authorized to render judgment in any single case, but only to ascertain and report the facts to the House, and the House shall determine, on the basis of the report from the Court of Claims, whether or not the property was taken, whether the question of loyalty is satisfied, and whether the appropriation shall be made to pay for it. This claim, however, is taken from the jurisdiction of that court altogether and given a privilege not conferred upon the others. It goes beyond it, preference being given to it over all other claims of its class.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I have already stated that the gentleman from Mississippi, who is the author of this bill, is not present. In his absence I would like to have the bill informally passed over.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I have not yielded the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman to yield.

Mr. ENLOE. The gentleman from Iowa certainly yielded the floor, for he took his seat.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman reserved his time of course the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. BUTLER. I am willing to yield time to the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that when a gentleman takes his seat without reserving his time he is regarded as having yielded the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. But I have not taken my seat since I first rose. [Laughter.] I yield, however, to the gentleman from Tennessee for a suggestion.

Mr. ENLOE. As the gentleman from Mississippi, who is the author of this bill, is not present, I think it will be proper, in view of the manifest opposition to its passage, that it should be passed over informally until he can be present. I therefore ask that the bill be passed over.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa or some other gentleman, in regard to this bill, a question as to the evidence which may be used in connection with it.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield a moment?

The gentleman from Tennessee states that the author of the bill, Mr. CATCHINGS of Mississippi, is not in the House or in the committee, and asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over informally until his return. Is there objection?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think we had better dispose of this now.

Mr. ENLOE. That is just what I expected from the gentleman from Indiana, and that is exactly what he intended to do in framing these rules to consume all this time. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. How long?

Mr. BUTLER. As long as you choose to recognize him. I will quit. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say to the gentleman that I understand him to give as a reason the fact that the gentleman who framed the bill [Mr. CATCHINGS] is not now present, and that he would wish to be heard on the bill.

Mr. ENLOE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is he detained by sickness?

Mr. ENLOE. I do not know why he is detained. I am not able to account for the absence of every member who may be absent from the House.

Mr. CATCHINGS at this point appeared on the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] who presented this bill, is now in the House. Still, if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] requests it, as far as I am concerned, the bill may go over.

Mr. ENLOE. I shall not request it unless the gentleman from Mississippi does.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Let the bill be considered.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the last portion of this bill is the important part of it. It is as follows:

To try and determine the same according to law and equity, as if the same were not barred by the statute of limitations.

Now the first question that arises is whether it is desirable to suspend the statute of limitations in cases of this class after a lapse of twenty-five years. That is the important difference between this provision and the provision of the law known as the Bowman act. Under that law, if a claim is barred by the statute of limitations—and I hope gentlemen who have not familiarized themselves with this legislation will observe this fact—if a claim is barred by the statute of limitations it can not be considered under the Bowman act.

Mr. ENLOE. It can be considered under the Tucker act.

Mr. HOLMAN. It can not under the Bowman act.

Mr. ENLOE. If this Congress refers it it can be considered under the Tucker act.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is a case where you bring a suit founded on a contract with the Government or upon a liability created by law. Here a farm had been taken possession of at the seat of war and freedmen placed upon it. Gentlemen are aware that great camps were established all over that country where freedmen were gathered together for the purpose of farming. It is hardly necessary for me to say that at the time mentioned here, 1865, that farm must have been situated at the seat of war.

By this bill, after suspending the Bowman act, and waiving the statute of limitations, it is then provided that, without any reference to the character of the claim, whether barred on any other ground or not, final judgment shall be rendered, placing this claim upon a very different footing from the attitude it would occupy under the Bowman law, which was intended to relieve Congress of the burden of securing and reporting upon all the facts,

Mr. DICKERSON. I desire to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. DICKERSON. I wish to ask the gentleman if he is in favor of any rule that will enforce the statute of limitations against widows and orphans for supplies forcibly taken to maintain the United States Army, and is still willing to pension men who rendered services as long ago?

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not exactly get that question.

Mr. DICKERSON. I will ask it again. I will ask the gentleman from Indiana if he is prepared to insist upon this floor that the widows, orphans, and other loyal people in that section of the country who were forcibly compelled to furnish supplies for the United States Army ought to be barred by the statutes of limitations while gentlemen demand pensions for services rendered as long ago.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no statutes of limitations as to pensions.

Mr. DICKERSON. Are you in favor of insisting on the statute of limitation against the one class and not against the other?

Mr. HOLMAN. As this is the first case that has come up——

Mr. DICKERSON. I would like to have the gentleman answer my question.

Mr. STOCKDALE. You ought not to ask a question that the gentleman can not answer.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will say to the gentleman that I feel compelled to take the course that I do because my sense of duty requires it.

Mr. DICKERSON. Are you refusing to do justice because you are not compelled to do it?

Mr. HOLMAN. If my friend will allow me, I propose to discuss this matter. There is no occasion for excitement about it.

Mr. DICKERSON. You say you are compelled by your sense of duty.

Mr. HOLMAN. I feel compelled by my sense of duty to take the course which I am taking.

Mr. DICKERSON. Are you willing to do justice to the people who were forcibly compelled to furnish supplies to the Army.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to do justice by everybody. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to the provisions of two sections of the Bowman act, and I ask that the title of that act, and the third and fourth sections, may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the portions designated by the gentleman from Indiana.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government.

* * * * * * *

SEC. 3. The jurisdiction of said court shall not extend to or include any claim against the United States growing out of the destruction or damage to property by the Army or Navy during the war for the suppression of the rebellion or for the use and occupation of real estate by any part of the military or naval forces of the United States in the operations of said forces during the said war at the seat of war; nor shall the said court have jurisdiction of any claim against the United States which is now barred by virtue of the provisions of any law of the United States.

SEC. 4. In any case of a claim for supplies or stores taken by or furnished to any part of the military or naval forces of the United States for their use during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, the petition shall aver that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom such supplies or stores were taken, did not give any aid or comfort to said rebellion, but was throughout that war loyal to the Government of the United States, and the fact of such loyalty shall be a jurisdictional fact; and unless the said court shall, on a preliminary inquiry, find that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom the same were taken as aforesaid, was loyal to the Government of the United States throughout said war, the court shall not have jurisdiction of such cause, and the same shall, without further proceedings, be dismissed.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will therefore be seen that Congress in passing that law intended to bar all these claims by the operation of the statute of limitations, and probably the court considered this as a claim for the use and occupation of lands at the seat of war. Now, gentlemen will see that this bill just evades these two points. It suspends the statute of limitations as to this claim, and whether the court find it was for the use and occupation at the seat of war or not, judgment must be rendered. The House is assuming, if we are going to act upon this measure, a rather unusual degree of responsibility. The question is whether we are to inaugurate a policy contrary to a provision of law passed in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Of course, I would not object to this act if it were amended so as to provide that the court shall report the facts, and I have drawn up an amendment for that purpose. Let it go to the Court of Claims to find and report the facts to Congress. I have no objection to that, because it would be in conformity with the policy adopted in the Forty-seventh Congress, and to which from that time we have adhered. For one, I hope there will be no departure from a policy which has been followed from the Forty-seventh Congress down to the present time. Let this case go to the Court of Claims. If this party was loyal and the land was occupied at the seat of war for the use of the Federal Government, why, of course, the claim ought to be paid, and if those were the facts, it will be paid.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. Mr. Chairman, I am not so familiar with the facts in this case——

Mr. CATCHINGS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I have but little time, and I do not think I can yield.

Mr. CATCHINGS. What I was going to do was to make a request that this matter be allowed to lie over until next Friday.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. That request has been made once and objected to.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor unless he yields to the request.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I yield to the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] asks unanimous consent that the further consideration of this bill be deferred until Friday next. Is there obejction? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Private Calendar.

SAMUEL HOWARD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3888) for the relief of Samuel Howard.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Samuel Howard, of Henderson County, Tenn., the sum of $950, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full for property taken from him by the forces of the United States and applied to the use of the Army of the United States.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the report in this case be read in my time.

The report (by Mr. ENLOE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3888) for the relief of Samuel Howard, submit the following report:

The history of the claim is set forth in House report from the Committee on War Claims, first session, Fiftieth Congress, which is appended as a part of this report.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

[House Report No. 1129, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The claim of Samuel Howard, of Henderson County, Tenn., was originally filed before the commissioners of claims and rejected by them, because the United States commissioner failed to adopt a certain set of questions then recently prescribed for the examination of claimants, instead of adhering to the earlier form of questions adopted by the commissioners. For this failure of the agent of the commissioners and of the Government to properly perform his duty the claimant was in no wise responsible, and the committee think the commissioners, instead of rejecting the claim, should have ordered the United States commissioner to retake the testimony, if the particular formula was an essential requisite. Subsequently the Quartermaster-General sent the case to the agent of that Department, who took the testimony again, and the proof in the case shows that the claimant proved the loss of his property and its appropriation and use by the United States Army, by his own testimony and the testimony of two witnesses, corroborated by the testimony of other witnesses.

The loyalty of the claimant is established by the testimony of prominent Union men and Federal soldiers, who swear that he was loyal throughout the war, and the agent of the Quartermaster's Department reports the claimant as a man of undoubted loyalty; but the Quartermaster-General refused to adjudicate the claim because it had been considered by another tribunal. The accompanying correspondence between Hon. B. A. ENLOE and Gen. S. B. Holabird is made a part of this report. The premises considered, the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, U. S.,
Washington, D. C., February 23, 1888.

DEAR SIR: My attention has been called to the case of Samuel Howard, of Henderson County, Tenn., disallowed by your predecessor in office. Knowing Mr. Howard personally, and knowing his established reputation for loyalty, I was led to examine the papers in the case. It appears from the evidence on file that the loyalty of the claimant was proven by the testimony of all the prominent Union men and Federal soldiers in his county, and acknowledged as proven by Mr. Putnam, the agent of the Government.

I know Mr. Howard, and know that he would not attempt to perpetrate a fraud upon the Government. I am personally acquainted with most of the witnesses who testified in the case, and they are men of such character as to preclude the idea of combinations to defraud the Government, or that they would commit perjury, and their loyalty is unquestioned.

I desire that you personally examine the records on file in this case, and I request that you will cause the same to be reopened for a rehearing, and send the papers to your duly accredited agent for further testimony, if necessary, to be taken in the case. From the examination which I made of the papers it appears that your predecessor disallowed the claim because it had been previously considered by the commissioners of claims. From their findings it appears that they held the claimant responsible for the failure of the United States commissioner, their representative, to adopt the proper form of questions in interrogating the claimant. I am satisfied that this is a just claim and should be allowed.

Respectfully, yours,

B. A. ENLOE,
M. C. Eighth District, Tennessee.

Gen. S. B. HOLABIRD, Quartermaster-General.

WAR DEPARTMENT, QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 27, 1888.

SIR: Referring to your communication of the 23d instant relative to a claim of Samuel Howard, of Henderson County, Tenn., for a horse, mules, etc., stated at $955, you are respectfully informed—

That it appears from the records of this office that when the claim was taken up for consideration by my predecessor it was found that a claim embracing the items charged for in the one now in question had been filed before the commissioners of claims (commonly known as the Southern Claims Commissioners), and was by them considered and disallowed for lack of proof of loyalty and taking and use of stores.

For those reasons the claim was dismissed from further consideration in this office by my predecessor.

It is only just to state that there has been filed testimony which was not before the commissioners of claims, and which it is probable might have produced a different conclusion had it been in possession of that tribunal at the time of its decision.

It is further to be remarked that the papers in the case filed in this office were transmitted to the honorable the Secretary of War for the House Committee on War Claims, on the 30th of January last.

Your letter of the 23d instant is herewith returned in accordance with your request.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. B. HOLABIRD,
Quartermaster-General, United States Army.

Hon. B. A. ENLOE,
House of Representatives.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I suppose I might have reasonable hope for the passage of this bill, because the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE], I believe, was not willing in the last Congress to make any very serious opposition to it, and it was amended to suit the views of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. The bill was passed in the last Congress, and went to the Senate, but failed to pass there after a favorable report to the Senate because they had not time to consider it. It has been reported favorably three times, and I do not think there will be any objection to the passage of this bill. It only involves a small amount of money, and there is no doubt as to the justness of the claim.

Mr. DICKERSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know anything about the merits of this claim, but I want to state my views upon the general proposition with regard to all these matters which are reported here by the Committee on War Claims. I believe, sir, that there is no honest way for a solvent party to escape paying an honest debt by honest methods. This Government is solvent, and able to pay its just debts. If I, as a citizen of the United States, were to go abroad and declare that it would not pay its just debts, I would be justly denounced by my fellow-citizens throughout the entire country. We have heard the honor and credit of this country glorified for the last twenty-five years. When we made the bonds payable in gold, it was said it was due to the honor and credit of this country to maintain its promise in gold and lawful money.

We heard it insisted here, when there was a threat of war with Chile, that the honor of this country demanded that we should send an ultimatum to that country, so that our honor might be vindicated, and they should be compelled to yield to this country that which we considered was proper and just. And yet we find gentlemen here insisting that the statutes of limitations should be resorted to by the Government of the United States to avoid paying an honest debt. In my section of country, a man who is solvent and will resort to that scheme to avoid his honest debts, meets the condemnation of every honest man in his section, and he ought to do. And, sir, I trust in the name of a country whose honor is dear to me, that this House will not permit a policy to be adopted by the Government that is discreditable to individuals. I think that the widow who was forced to give up every dollar of property that she had, to give up the last horse that there was to carry the grist to the mill to feed her children, for the purpose of carrying on and supporting the war against the rebellion, is as much entitled to consideration for that sacrifice she made as the brawny man who gave his body and his time in the defense of the country.

Sir, it needed not only men, but money to wage and maintain that war, and the horses and the property and the supplies were equally necessary with the money and the services of men. Upon what theory can the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] say to those who live upon the opposite side of the Ohio River, that I shall stand here day by day (as I desire to do) and vote a pension to every worthy soldier who asks for it, while at the same time he holds that the loyal people upon my side of the river who surrendered their property for the support of the Government shall be debarred from receiving compensation by a statute of limitations, an act which I have no doubt he drafted and voted for, or, if he did not, I am satisfied that his policy suggested it.

Now, sir, I am opposed to this method of dealing with our citizens, and this Congress is opposed to this method. Here we are, twenty-five years after the war, keeping in existence a Committee on War Claims. What for? Is it possible to bring to the consideration of this House at this time any claim twenty-five years old that is not barred by the statute? Yet as I have said, our sense of justice, the sense of justice of every Congress from the war until now, has kept in existence a Committee on War Claims for the purpose of dealing honestly and justly with our fellow-citizens who may have proper claims against the Government arising out of the war.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DICKERSON. Certainly.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I would be glad if this discussion could be confined to the bill under consideration.

Mr. HOLMAN. My question is this. If it is proper that the statute of limitations should not apply to these cases, when they come to Congress—the few of them that do come here, and they are comparatively very few—would not the fair and honorable thing to do be to repeal the statute? Why discriminate in favor of these claims as against thousands of others that do not come before Congress?

Mr. DICKERSON. I do not believe you ought to have any such statute in cases of this kind.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then would not the proper remedy be to repeal the statute?

Mr. DICKERSON. Yes; I think that probably would be the proper remedy; but it is not possible to get that remedy now, and I am in favor of doing justice, as far as we can, in these individual cases by dealing honestly with every individual who presents his claim here. I agree that the closest scrutiny ought to be applied to all these bills. I am willing to concede that the loyalty of the people in some sections was exceedingly doubtful, but I know that in many cases it was not doubtful. The widows and children could not have been disloyal.

I have in mind a loyal old citizen, 83 years of age, who is compelled to work to maintain himself, and who, if the weather is as bad at his home as it is here to-day, is exposing himself to the storms of winter merely to earn a living, because the Government of the United States consumed every ear of corn that he had produced and took away from him every solitary head of stock that he could have used to produce more, leaving him absolutely in want. That was not done, probably, by his consent, because he could hardly have consented to be left destitute; but they came and by force stripped him of all that he possessed, although he was a loyal and faithful citizen of the United States.

This man's property was taken for the benefit of the Government without his consent; and yet the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] insists that, although the Government uses force in such a case to take away the property of the citizen, there is no such obligation on the part of the Government to compensate him as there is to compensate by pensions the men who voluntarily exposed themselves to the dangers of the war! Now, sir, I am in favor of simple justice and equality. I am in favor of the old Democratic doctrine of not discriminating in favor of anybody. If this Government owes me $1 or $100, or owes any other man that sum, it never can escape the obligation to pay it until it does pay it; and as long as I am upon this floor I shall insist, whatever may be the result to the Treasury of the United States, that whenever a claim is a just and honest one, the United States of America can not honorably escape the payment of that claim.

The position of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is this: that, while the individual had no right to sue the United States, it is proper now to bar the claim because he did not sue.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to state that the statute of limitations has nothing to do with this case, and I shall be glad to have a vote, because I do not think it is a controverted case.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] moves that this bill be laid aside and reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I could not quite understand the case from the reading of the report. What I did catch of it led me to conclude that the bill had been before the Southern Claims Commission and, after a hearing of the proof upon the ground, had been rejected. I understood, also, that it was reopened later, but I could not tell from the reading whether the report stated that it was afterwards approved or passed upon by any court or commission, or not. I wish the gentleman would explain that.

Mr. ENLOE. I will state, in reply to the gentleman from Texas, that this claim was taken up and considered by the Southern Claims Commission, and was rejected on account of the adoption of an old form of questions by the United States commissioner. They had recently changed the form of questions, and he happened to question this particular claimant and his witnesses under the old form, so that the examination was informal, and the Commission rejected it upon that ground. The case, however, was afterwards investigated by the Quartermaster's Department, and I addressed a letter to the Quartermaster-General, which has been read, with his reply.

The agent of that department reports that the claimant was loyal, and the commissioner himself, who took the testimony, has testified to the credibility of the witnesses who gave testimony in the case in favor of the claimant. We passed the bill in the last Congress, and it went to the Senate, and, as I stated before, there is no controversy about it in the committee, and there ought not to be any in the House. I hope the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. KILGORE. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] states as a reason why this bill ought to pass now that I did not make any very vigorous opposition to it in the last Congress.

Mr. ENLOE. Did I say that just now?

Mr. KILGORE. The gentleman used words to that effect. Now, if I did not oppose it in the last Congress, that was probably one of my mistakes, and it is important that I should rectify it in this Congress.

Mr. ENLOE. The gentleman is always making mistakes; and I am not responsible for them.

Mr. KILGORE. The gentleman also states that the bill has been so amended as to meet the views of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who sometimes makes opposition to measures of this kind. I do not think these are sufficient grounds for the withdrawing of my opposition to the bill. But here is the point I wish to come to: Is it not a fact—and I address the inquiry to the gentleman from Tennessee—is it not a fact that this claim was originally rejected by the Southern Claims Commission because of the disloyalty of the claimant?

Mr. ENLOE. It is not the fact.

Mr. KILGORE. Did they find that he was loyal?

Mr. ENLOE. They did not pass on that question, but the agent of the War Department did find him loyal, and so reported.

Mr. KILGORE. Well, he ought to have a chromo. [Laughter.]

Mr. ENLOE. Let us vote him the $1,000 that is due him; that will be better than a chromo.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, something has been said by my friend from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] and my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] with reference to the manner in which matters of this kind should be disposed of, and I wish to say a word in reply. The Bowman act, which has been referred to by my friend from Indiana, was (as is very well known to gentlemen who have been members for some time) amended in 1883 by the passage of what is known as the "Tucker amendment to the Bowman act."

The purpose of this legislation was to refer all claims coming before committees of the House of Representatives or the Senate and all claims coming before the heads of the Departments to the Court of Claims—not for the purpose of having that court give judgment for a specific amount, but for the purpose of having it report back the facts, leaving the House and the Senate to determine the propriety of enacting a law for the payment of such amount. I call attention to the first section of what is known as the Tucker amendment to the Bowman act. This amendatory act is entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," and is to be found in the supplement to the Revised Statutes, volume 1, page 403. The first section provides—

That whenever a claim or matter is pending before any committee of the Senate or House of Representatives, or before either House of Congress, which involves the investigation or determination of facts, the committee or House may cause the same, with the vouchers, papers, proof, and documents pertaining thereto to be transmitted to the Court of Claims of the United States; and the same shall there be proceeded in under such rules as the court may adopt. When the facts shall have been found the court shall not enter judgment thereon, but shall report the same to the committee or to the House by which the case was transmitted for its consideration.

Now, as to the question of loyalty to which reference has been made, the act goes on further to provide that the court shall primarily and as a question lying at the threshold of all these cases, determine first the question of loyalty, and if they shall find that the claimant is loyal, they shall then proceed to investigate the facts and make report to the committee of the respective Houses or to the Department. Now, in response to what has fallen from the gentleman from Indiana and my friend from Texas, I wish to say that my only regret in regard to the Bowman act and the amendatory act of 1883, introduced by my friend Mr. Tucker from Virginia, is that this legislation did not go far enough.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman regard what is known as "the Tucker law" as an amendment to "the Bowman act?" Do they not refer to entirely different classes of claims against the Government? The Bowman act, as I think the gentleman will find, applies to claims which are not in the nature of legal demands against the Government, claims of which the court without that act would not have jurisdiction. The Tucker law, on the other hand, confers upon the courts of the United States, not simply the Court of Claims, jurisdiction to hear and determine, with certain exceptions, "all claims founded upon the Constitution of the United States or any law of Congress." The authority conferred upon the Court of Claims by the Bowman act, with reference to such claims as that now under consideration, is merely to examine and report the facts without power to render any judgment thereon.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rose a moment ago for the purpose of stating what the gentleman from Indiana has just stated—that the act known as the Tucker act has no reference whatever to the Bowman act, those two acts referring to different classes of claims. I think, too, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] will find by reference to the Bowman act that he is mistaken in stating that that act requires loyalty to be found as a jurisdictional fact in all the cases sent to the court by Congress. The first section specifies the class of cases which may be considered by the court under the act; but it is only under the third section applying to claims for stores or supplies taken for the purposes of the Army that the loyalty of the party becomes a jurisdictional fact.

Now, the Supreme Court of the United States having decided that the question of disloyalty of every person in the United States, except perhaps one or two, had been wiped out by the general proclamation of pardon and amnesty, there was no necessity to plead or allege loyalty in any petition in any court in the United States; and Congress innovated upon that decision in this act in the two cases mentioned, stores and supplies.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I will read now, Mr. Chairman, the fourth section of the Tucker amendment, which makes the provision I refer to:

SEC. 4. In any case of a claim for supplies or stores taken by or furnished to any part of the military or naval forces of the United States for their use during the late war for the suppression of the rebellion, the petition shall aver that the person who furnished such supplies or stores, or from whom such supplies or stores were taken, did not give any aid or comfort to said rebellion, but was throughout that war loyal to the Government of the United States, and the fact of such loyalty shall be a jurisdictional fact.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the gentleman from Mississippi pardon me for one other suggestion?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. The cases referred to in that section are not the cases referred to in the first section.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I understand that very well. I was going on to say, Mr. Chairman, that my only regret is that the Bowman act, and the Tucker act, which is an amendment to the former act with reference to a certain class of cases, had not gone farther and given to the courts of the United States, whether to the Court of Claims or the district courts of the United States in the region of country where the party resides, the power to adjudicate upon the question of the claim of any citizen against the Government.

There was a large portion of property collected immediately after the close of the war and known as captured and abandoned property, which was sold and the proceeds turned into the Treasury, amounting in the aggregate, I think, to twenty-four or twenty-five millions of dollars; and of that fund there yet remains in the Treasury of the United States a large sum, being a separate and distinct fund, under the adjudications of the Supreme Court, which can never be commingled with the other funds of the Treasury, but which has to be held as a trust fund to respond to the claims of any party who can prove he is entitled to receive a portion of it for property taken and sold under that act.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is well said by one of the most distinguished jurists who ever graced the bench in this country, Judge Story, of Massachusetts, that it was a reproach to the freest Government on earth; that while the oldest and most autocratic governments of the old world conceded to their citizens the power to go into their own tribunals and establish their claims against the government it was refused to our citizens; and so, speaking before the creation of this Court of Claims, which has only a quasi jurisdiction, Judge Story said it was a reproach to the country that a citizen could not go into the courts and present his claim, and if upon the law and facts he was entitled to a judgment to have the privilege of obtaining it. He could not go into any court of the United States, in the region of country where he lived, or into the Court of Claims after its creation with qualified jurisdiction without finding in all of them the rights of the Government amply protected—by the Attorney-General in the Supreme Court, and by the district attorneys in the other courts, to defend the claims of the Government; and wherever a citizen can establish his claim under such circumstances he ought to be allowed to do so.

I do not think that there ought to be a bar to any man in the Southern country, who has a just claim, in presenting it before the courts of this country. Instead of putting a limit upon their jurisdiction I think the jurisdiction of the courts ought to be extended so as to cover all such cases.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, this is a very edifying discussion, but it has no relevancy to the bill under consideration. I hope we will have a vote upon the bill.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I only wanted to correct the erroneous ideas which seemed to prevail with the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ENLOE. I move that the bill be laid aside and reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

AQUILLA JONES, SR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 914) for the relief of Aquilla Jones, sr.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit Aquilla Jones, sr., late postmaster at Indianapolis, Ind., in the final settlement of his accounts, with the sum of $2,438, amount of loss sustained by him as such postmaster by robbery on the 31st day of December, 1888.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, this bill was introduced by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM], who will make a statement to the committee in regard to the facts covered by the claim.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, the report in this case is quite lengthy, and would take up considerable time to read it. I can state the facts simply and briefly. They are these: The claim was presented to the Post-Office Department under Postmaster-General Dickinson, was thoroughly examined by him, and he offered to remit the full amount that he was permitted by law to remit, but as the limit was $2,000 that action was not taken, the party preferring to come to Congress for relief, for he would have had to come anyhow for the remainder. That recommendation was made in the Fiftieth Congress. The bill passed the Senate then, and was also passed in the last Congress, but never has been able to be passed by the House, for the reason that it could not be reached on the Calendar.

Mr. KILGORE. What is the amount of the claim?

Mr. BYNUM. The claim is for twenty-four hundred and some odd dollars.

Mr. BLOUNT. For what is the claim?

Mr. BYNUM. It is for a robbery of the post-office at Indianapolis during the administration of Mr. Jones as postmaster. The money was in the charge of the postmaster. This was in 1888, I think, and the robbery took place from the money-order department, not from the postmaster, but from the superintendent of the money-order division. The recommendation of the Department, I have stated, is that the relief should be granted. But this money has not been paid. The Department, in anticipation of the relief by Congress, held the accounts open, and they are still open.

The bill simply directs the Postmaster-General to close up the account and credit this postmaster with the amount, the balance of the account having been closed.

Mr. BUSHNELL. When did the robbery occur?

Mr. BYNUM. In the latter part of 1888, or the spring of 1889; I think in 1889.

Mr. BLOUNT. Let me ask if the question of fact as to the robbery was examined by the Department?

Mr. BYNUM. Yes, sir; the question of fact was examined by the Department. The whole proof was laid before the Department, and the proofs are incorporated in the report. It was all passed on by the Department favorably.

Mr. BUNN. I simply rise to say that this bill came from the Committee on Claims, and there is a very strong impression in the committee on the part of a number of the members of it that the bill ought not to pass. It is the desire on the part of that minority to file a report. I think it will settle a very important question, and it ought to be considered, and fully considered, by this House. I hope the bill will be passed over until the minority report comes in. I ask that it be informally passed over.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is there any question about the fact that a robbery occurred?

A MEMBER. No, there is no question about that.

Mr. BUNN. None whatever, but there are circumstances connected with the robbery which show that the postmaster was culpably negligent, and we want to show that fact in the report which we wish to file.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield?

Mr. BUNN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. This claim does not come from my side of the House, and in one sense I have not the personal interest in the matter that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] has, but in the interest of justice I desire to say to the members of the House that during the last Congress I took occasion to look this claim up, and in my judgment there is no reason whatever why this case should be postponed, or why the money should not be refunded. It has been delayed along because the Post-Office Department, as has already been stated by the gentleman from Indiana, have suspended action, hoping and trusting that Congress would reimburse this officer for the money. The circumstances show that he was absolutely without fault.

Mr. LOUD. I will say to the gentleman that I think under the circumstances this would be establishing a bad precedent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BUNN] has the floor, and only yielded for a question.

Mr. BUNN. As I understand it, the report in this case has not been printed at all. I would like to inquire if it has been printed?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed by the Clerk at the desk that it has been printed, but it has not been read.

Mr. BYNUM. I will say that the report of the last Congress was printed, and the affidavits and papers in the case are the same.

Mr. BUNN. I insist that the minority of the committee should be heard. This minority desire to file a report. The report came in only yesterday. We have not seen the report of the majority, and we desire time, which we hope the House will give us, to file a minority report. If there is anything in the minority report, why then we desire it adopted; and if not, we think at least we should have an opportunity to be heard. After we are heard, if the House does not agree with the minority report it can be voted down. All we ask now is that the time we request be given us. I move that this bill be informally passed over.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Chairman, I am desirous that the House shall have full information upon this matter. It is a matter of importance, and I will say to the gentleman that the only reason I feel urgent about the matter at all is that the Government will be compelled to bring suit on this bond within the next three weeks; but I will ask that the bill be passed over until next Friday, so that a minority report may be presented to the House, if desired.

Mr. MANSUR. I ask to be heard for two minutes in reply to my friend, the chairman of the committee. I made this report. There was some contention in the committee, but I must say to the House that this is the first request I ever heard on the part of any of the minority to make a report. No such intimation has ever been given me from any source by any member of the committee. There was a discussion in the committee, but it was not asked that there be any minority report submitted. I must say this in justice to myself. Now, the committee have passed three or four cases of this kind, and the minority of the committee are taking the ground that there ought to be no relief given to any officer or employé of the post-office, from the postmaster down, because they say that the postmaster can protect himself by a bond from every employé—overturning every precedent that has existed in that committee for the last few years.

That was the only contest in the committee that I heard of. No one denied the justness of the bill, because no one disputed the fact that there was a robbery, and the Postmaster-General, who investigated the question, expressly decided that there was no negligence, and recommended the payment.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the Chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. RICHARDSON reported that the Committee of the Whole, having had under consideration bills on the Private Calendar, had directed him to report to the House the bill (H. R. 3888) for the relief of Samuel Howard with the recommendation that the same do pass.

Mr. ENLOE. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ENLOE, the motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

HOUR OF MEETING ON SATURDAY.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, the House is aware of the fact that the session of to-morrow after 1 o'clock is set apart for addresses in commemoration of Gen. W. H. F. Lee. After the Journal has been read there will be very little time to be occupied between 12 and 1 o'clock, so I submit a motion that when the House adjourn it be to meet at 1 o'clock; and I will state that I do this after consultation with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER].

The question was put, and the motion was agreed to.

Subsequently

Mr. HOLMAN said: Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the special order for to-morrow commences at 1 o'clock, and the reading of the Journal will occupy from five to fifteen minutes, I ask unanimous consent to amend the proposition which has already been agreed to, so that the time of meeting of the House shall be fifteen minutes to 1 o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. I suppose it is understood that no business, except the reading of the Journal, shall be transacted.

Mr. HOLMAN. That will be the understanding.

Mr. DINGLEY. With that understanding there is no objection.

There was no objection; and the motion of Mr. HOLMAN was agreed to.

REPORT OF BOARD OF MANAGERS OF SOLDIERS' HOMES.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to ask for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed one-half the usual number of the report of the Board of Managers of the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers for the year ending June 30, 1891, and that the numbers of this document and the parts thereof ordered printed by the resolution of the House of the 26th of January, 1892, be printed for the use of the Board of Managers of the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and that the Public Printer be authorized to deliver the same to the president of said Board.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I will say that this merely provides for having some printing done.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. OUTHWAITE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PUBLIC SCHOOL ADJOINING PENSACOLA NAVY-YARD.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a change of reference of a petition in regard to the establishment of a public school for the benefit of children living in the villages of Warrington and Woolsey, Fla., adjoining the United States navy-yard. The petition was referred to the Committee on Education, whereas a bill to carry out the idea has been referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I have therefore been requested to have the reference changed, so that the petition may go to that committee.

There was no objection, and the change of reference requested was ordered.

VACATION OF EVENING SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that there are not enough reports on the Private Calendar, in the judgment of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to justify a session to-night, if there be no objection, I will ask that the order be vacated for this evening.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GEISSENHAINER. That is provided for by the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, already adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That provided that when the House adjourn to-day, it be to meet at a specified hour to-morrow. That would be after the House adjourns this evening.

There was no objection, and the motion of Mr. MARTIN was agreed to.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 6, 1892.

The House met at 12 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m. The Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O, Eternal God, we are here to commemorate the life and the devotion of a late eminent member of this House, illustrious by birth, illustrious in station, enshrined in the heart's core of all that knew him. As these gaps are made in our ranks by the hand of Death, grant, O God, that the solemn lesson of our mortality may come home to us with impressive weight. May we be inspired to serve Thee, our country, and our fellow-men with supreme devotion and singleness of purpose, living so that when Death shall summon us to the world so near at hand, and yet invisible, we may gather up our feet and depart in peace, and be received into the mansions of eternal blessedness. We pray through Jesus Christ, our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House take a recess until 1 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

The recess having expired, the House reconvened at 1 o'clock p. m.

DEATH OF HON. W. H. F. LEE.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, February 6, beginning at 1 o'clock afternoon, be set apart for paying tribute to the memory of Hon. William Henry Fitzhugh Lee, late a member of the House of Representatives from the Eighth district of the State of Virginia.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. William Henry Fitzhugh Lee, late a Representative from the State of Virginia.

Resolved, As a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and recognition in of his eminent ability and distinguished public services, that the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

The resolutions were adopted.

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Speaker, this day having been set apart for the purpose of paying a last tribute to the memory of one who so lately was a loved and honored member of this House, I shall, in the brief remarks which I propose to make, attempt nothing but a plain and truthful narrative of some of the characteristics and public services of a Christian gentleman, who, in my judgment, measured fully up to that standard which makes man the noblest work of God.

On the 15th day of October, 1891, at Ravensworth, his beautiful home in Fairfax County, Va., surrounded by those loved ones whose constant care and tender nursing had done all that human power could do to stay the hand of the fell destroyer, all that was mortal of the Hon. William Henry Fitzhugh Lee passed from this earth, and his noble spirit returned to the God who gave it.

If the earnest supplications to Almighty God, offered by the good people of his native State, upon their bended knees, night and morning, during the period of his lingering illness, could have availed, he would have been restored to health and usefulness, and these melancholy proceedings postponed for many a long year.

The great sorrow which made the heart of Virginia heavy, and bowed in grief the heads of her true sons and daughters when the sad intelligence of his death was flashed over the electric wires, was more genuinely spontaneous than were the loud lamentations of the Roman populace (so graphically described by Tacitus) when they beheld the widow of Germanicus with her weeping children entering the gates of the imperial city.

Nor was this sorrow confined to those of his own political faith. Men of all parties vied with each other in their expressions of regret at his death and in their sympathy for his bereaved family.

The blameless life he had led, his high character, his gentle and unassuming manners won for him not only the respect but the admiration of all with whom he came in contact.

As gentle as a child and as tender as a woman, with the courage of a hero and a faith that never faltered, he proved himself a worthy descendant of that race of famous men from whom he sprung, and most worthily bore a name which will be honored as long as a liberty-loving people shall find a dwelling place upon the earth.

W. H. F. Lee was the son of Gen. Robert E. Lee, and was born at Arlington on the 31st day of May, 1837.

He was educated at Harvard, where he ranked not only as a good scholar, but on account of his splendid size and strength became quite famous in athletics, being "stroke oar" of the university rowing club.

His great ambition was to follow the profession of his father and to go to West Point; but having had an older brother there, that fact was considered in those days an insuperable obstacle. While still at Harvard completing his education, he was, through the interest taken in him by Gen. Winfield Scott, who made the request as a special and personal favor to himself, appointed in 1857 a second lieutenant in the Sixth Regiment United States Infantry, and inaugurated his military career by taking a detachment of troops to Texas by sea and then by land up the country to San Antonio.

In 1858 he accompanied his regiment, under the command of Col. Albert Sidney Johnston, in the expedition to Utah against the Mormons, taking an active part in that campaign, marching from Fort Leavenworth to Salt Lake City, and then, when the troubles were quelled there, traveling on foot to Fort Benicia, Cal. While on the Pacific coast he received a letter from his father, written January 1, 1859, in which he said:

I can not express the gratification I felt in meeting Col. May in New York, and at the encomiums he passed upon your soldiership, zeal, and devotion to your duty. But I was more pleased at the report of your conduct. I always thought and said there was stuff in you for a good soldier, and I trust you will prove it.

Resigning his commission in the Army he came home to be married to his cousin, a Miss Wickham, and settled down as a farmer at the "White House" (where Washington met Martha Custis and was married), a large estate on the Pamunkey River, left him by his maternal grandfather, G. W. Park Custis, of Arlington.

When that irrepressible conflict of 1861 was upon us, and Virginia called upon her sons to defend her soil, he, sharing the faith of his fathers, in the belief that his allegiance was due to his State, quickly raised a company of cavalry, and was attached to the Army of Northern Virginia. Serving in every grade successively from captain to major-general of cavalry, he led his regiment in the famous raid around McClellan's army, and was an active participant in all those brilliant achievements which made the cavalry service so proficient.

In that terrific fight which occurred at Brandy Station in June, 1863, he was most severely wounded and taken to the residence of Gen. William C. Wickham, in Hanover County, where he was made a prisoner by a raiding party, and was carried off, at the expense of great personal suffering, to Fortress Monroe. From the latter place he was conveyed to Fort Lafayette, where he was confined until March, 1864, and treated with great severity, being held with Capt. R. H. Tyler, of the Eighth Virginia Regiment, under sentence of death, as hostages for two Federal officers who were prisoners in Richmond, and whom it was thought would be executed for some retaliatory measure.

Exchanged in the spring of 1864, he returned to find his young wife and children dead, his beautiful home burned to the ground, his whole estate devastated and laid waste by the ruthless hand of war; and yet almost his first act on reaching Richmond was to go to Libby Prison, visit the two Federal officers for whom he had been held as hostage, and who, like himself, had been under apprehension of being hung, and shake hands with and congratulate them.

Immediately joining his command, he led his division in every engagement from the Rapidan to Appomattox, where, with his father, the greatest soldier of modern times, he surrendered to the inevitable.

In a letter written by one of the most brilliant cavalry generals of the late war, in speaking of Gen. W. H. F. Lee, he uses this language:

He was a zealous, conscientious, brave, and intelligent soldier, who fully discharged all of his duties. He was one of those safe, sound, judicious officers, and you always felt when you sent instructions to him that they were going to be obeyed promptly and to the letter.

What greater tribute could be paid a soldier?

Having been married to one of the most accomplished ladies in Virginia, Miss Bolling, of Petersburg, who, with two sons, survives him, he removed in 1874 to Ravensworth, and was the next year elected to the senate of Virginia, where he made an honorable record.

He was elected to the Fiftieth and Fifty-first Congresses, and served his State with that fidelity which had characterized his every act through life—faithful, conscientious and painstaking, ever alert to the interest of his constituents and seeking only how he could serve them.

He was again reëlected to the Fifty-second Congress, and though, by the will of Divine Providence, he was not permitted to take his seat, he will ever be held in grateful remembrance by his late constituents, and when the long roll of Virginia's noble and heroic dead is called the name of William H. Fitzhugh Lee will be mourned by his mother Commonwealth as one of her noblest and truest sons.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I shall read as the most fitting tribute I have seen, an editorial from the Alexandria Gazette, written the day after the death of Gen. Lee:

Gen. William Henry Fitzhugh Lee, second son of Gen. Robert Edward Lee, is dead. The bells here tolled late yesterday evening. A few hours before the general had crossed over the river and was at rest under his rooftree at Ravensworth the southern sun lighted his deathbed and the autumn breeze sang his requiem. After life's fitful fever he sleeps well. He was sick a long time, and as his disease was incurable, death was a relief. No more pain for him now, but the long and peaceful sleep of the just. His sorrowing family were at his bedside, but he told them not good-bye, preferring to greet them when they shall rejoin him in a better world. His death is regretted by all the many who knew him; the more so by those who knew him well.

Gen. Lee, like his father, was naturally quiet and retiring, and in his intercourse with others, when right and principle were not involved, invariably acted in accordance with the rule of noblesse oblige, but when they were involved he was as firm in support of his convictions as any other man could be. He stood foursquare to all the winds that blow, but always with the propriety that characterizes the perfect gentleman. He did his duty to his God, his family, his State, and his country, and did it well, and executed faithfully all the trusts committed to him in both military and civil life. He liked the old manners and customs of Virginia, but tried to conform to the new order of things with becoming grace, and did so with no audible complaint and with no useless repinings. He served his State efficiently in her senate and in the national Congress, and in the Confederate army he filled, by merited promotion, every position from captain up to major-general of cavalry. It was different once, but Virginia can ill-afford to part with such a man now, and in his death, as in that of his illustrious father, she has lost a true and gallant son, who, when not on duty, was as gentle as a woman. Her fame has been increased by having had such a son. May she have many more like him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to attempt any extended remarks upon the life and character of Gen. William H. F. Lee, late Representative from the Eighth Congressional district of Virginia, yet I can not permit this occasion to pass and my hand and heart to fail to pay my humble tribute to his memory. Gen. Lee's life had been spent, after manhood, in arms or as a tiller of the soil. In early life he saw military service as lieutenant in the Sixth Regiment United States Infantry, and was with Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston in the expedition in 1858 against the Mormons.

Resigning from the Army, he returned to his native State of Virginia and engaged in the pursuit of agriculture. Early in the late civil struggle he raised a cavalry company, and rose from the position of company commander to that of major-general, and followed the cause in which he had enlisted until the end at Appomattox. There two great military chieftains met, and one, his illustrious father, gave up to the other his sword and the mutilated remnant of an army which had fought with the utmost bravery and fortitude under a leader of unsurpassed skill and fidelity.

Gen. Lee, after the struggle had ended, resuming his citizenship in peace, returned to his farm and occupation of agriculture.

He was elected by his people from his senatorial district. He served one term in the senate of Virginia and declined a renomination. He was afterwards elected from the Eighth Congressional district of his State to the Fiftieth and Fifty-first Congresses, and again returned by his constituency to the present Congress; but the hand of death interposed, and he did not live to again take his seat in this legislative hall.

The name of Lee, Mr. Speaker, has been an illustrious one in Virginia. No one can with safety challenge the assertion that that old Commonwealth has furnished, from the time of the Revolution, as many great men, in peace and in war, as any of the States of our Union. When the foundations of this great Republic were laid, and constitutional principles evolved, whether the sword of the warrior or the mind and philosophy of the statesman were needed, you will find the marks and handiwork of some son of that State.

Among those great men the ancestry of Gen. Lee were conspicuous. He inherited from his great father a disposition that was frank, manly, and chivalrous. Although with these distinguished surroundings, Gen. Lee had no undue pride, reserve, or self-assertion. His nature, on the contrary, was eminently amiable, generous, and sympathetic, and at the same time he was dignified, manly, brave, and ever courteous.

Identified with the agricultural interests of his State, at one time president of the State society, and himself a practical and successful farmer and proud of his occupation, he mingled freely and congenially with that great class of our citizens upon whose shoulders repose in great measure the preservation and safety of the institutions of our common country. While he was especially devoted to the interests of the farmer, he was essentially a patriot, and loved his State and all its diverse interests with an enthusiastic devotion, and yearned for her prosperity.

He was a faithful, able, and vigilant representative, and had in the greatest degree the confidence of his constituents, and the people of his entire State. No one who ever knew him could fail to implicitly trust him. His State has lost a pure and noble son, the country a wise, conservative, and faithful representative. We who knew him here can recall his manly, robust form, his genial, kindly face, his frank, accessible address, his unfailing gentleness of manner, his cheerful, friendly voice, as he walked along the aisles of this Hall.

A man of his character and bearing could but wield an influence for good wherever his presence was.

In a republic, where the people are the state, the advice, the suggestions, and the example of a citizen so high minded and incorruptible are of great value, not only in the councils of the nation but in the everyday walks and details of life, in his beautiful rural home, surrounded by and mingling with his country people; and it was ever the pleasure and practice of Gen. Lee to associate freely and unrestrainedly with the great body of the people. His generous and noble heart had a sympathetic touch with them and their struggles, their callings, their work.

But he has passed from us under the decree of the great Master to the great hereafter, leaving the record of a life of singular purity, directness of purpose, and freedom from guile; the record of a character unblurred, untarnished, unshadowed by the least stain; the record of a man high, noble, honorable, faithful to all the duties and relations of life.

Mr. Speaker, Virginia, one of the oldest of the Commonwealths, within whose borders lie the remains of many great names, and the energies and reserved force of whose people in times gone by have risen to great heights, receives to her bosom her dead son, and bows with sincere grief over his grave; for to her, whether her hand wore the mailed gauntlet or followed the gentler pursuits of peace, he had ever been faithful, loyal, and true.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I shall leave to others the task of portraying the life of Gen. Lee in its diversified pursuits, and shall content myself with the effort of giving to the House my conception of some of the characteristics of our deceased friend, which made him, throughout his life, wherever placed, a conspicuous actor in private and public affairs.

In the early period of Virginia's history lived William Randolph, of Turkey Island (a plantation some 15 or 20 miles from the city of Richmond, near the scene of the terrific battle of Malvern Hill). He was the ancestor of all of that name in Virginia, and from him was descended, in direct line, Thomas Jefferson, John Marshall, and Robert E. Lee; the last named the father of our departed friend. How could he have manifested in his life less patriotism, justice, and courage with such examplars of these virtues ever before him?

His mother, as is well known, was a descendant from the wife of Gen. Washington by her prior marriage with Daniel Parke Custis. Sprung from such a lineage; trained in a school where the amenities of life as well as "the humanities" were taught in their highest excellence, he practiced from his earliest childhood a scrupulous regard for the rights and feelings of others, and an indulgence to all faults, except his own.

With a self-control and equipoise which were never disturbed under the most trying circumstances, and a graciousness of manner which broke down all barriers, giving to the humblest as well as to the highest the assurance of his friendly consideration, and a mind well-disciplined by education in the highest schools, it was impossible that he could have been other than a man of mark and influence in his State.

It is not claiming too much to say that Gen. Lee was the natural product of the civilization existing in Virginia during his boyhood and early manhood, which, alas, except here and there in certain localities, is fast passing away. The home, not the club, was its center; the family, not each "new-hatched, unfledged comrade," its unit. The father was the head of the family, not the joint tenant with the wife of a house nor the tenant at will of his wife. The wife and the mother was the queen of the household, not merely a housekeeper for a husband and the family. Obedience to those in authority was the first lesson exacted of the boy. Inculcated with tenderness, it was enforced with severity if need be, until the word of the father or the expressed wish of the mother carried with it the force of law as completely as the decree of a court or the mandate of a king.

Reverence for superiors in age and deference to all rather than arrogant self-assertion was magnified as a cardinal virtue, not as teaching humility and enforcing a lack of proper self-respect, but rather to exalt high ideals and stimulate an admiration for "the true, the beautiful, and the good."

Fidelity to truth, the maintenance of personal honor, deference for the opinions and feelings of others, without abating one's own or aggressively thrusting them on others; a kindliness of manner to dependents, a knightly courtesy to all, but with special and tender regard in thought, word, and action toward woman, were in turn patiently taught in all the lessons of the fireside and at the family altar, and earnestly insisted upon in the formation of the character of a true gentleman. "Any man will be polite to a beautiful young woman, but it takes a gentleman to show the same respect to a homely old woman," was the stinging rebuke of a father to his son who failed to remove his hat in passing a forlorn old woman on the public highway.

The old field school, the private tutor, the high school, whose excellence in Virginia I can not praise too much, the college, the university, led the young mind by easy stages to its full intellectual maturity.

Nowhere was the principle "Sana mens, in sano corpore" more scrupulously taught than in Virginia. The rod and stream, the gun, the "hounds and horns," the chase with the music of the pack, the bounding steed, all lent their ready aid in developing the physical manhood of the boy. In the pure atmosphere of his country home, amid its broad fields and virgin forests, contracted houses in narrow streets had no charms for him. To join the chase was the first promotion to which the boy looked as evidencing his permanent release from the nursery. The gun and dog became his constant companions, while ("Old Betsey") his father's trusted double-barreled gun of many years usage, standing in the sitting-room corner, or hanging on stag-horns or dogwood forks on the side of the wall, was the eloquent subject of nightly rehearsals of her prowess and power in the annual deer-hunt "over the mountains." Skill in horsemanship was essential, and breaking colts was naturally followed by broken limbs; but manhood found a race of trained horsemen, both graceful and skillful in the saddle, unexcelled, I dare venture to assert, by any civilized people. A child of nature, the Virginia boy communed with her as his mother, and from her purest depths drew the richest inspirations. To him no mountains were so blue as her's; no streams so clear, no forests so enchanting, no homes so sweet.

> While others hailed in distant skies the glories of the Union,
> He only saw the mountain bird stoop o'er his Old Dominion.

How vividly the picture comes to me now (never to be effaced) of a learned professor in one of Virginia's highest schools, himself three-score years and ten, a soldier of two wars, as he led the way through a quiet Virginia town on horseback followed by two sons, distinguished ministers of the gospel, and they in turn, by a younger son and the grandson of the leader with a goodly train of friends, amid the blasts of horns and baying of hounds, who followed, eager for the chase, among the beautiful hills which surround the town of Lexington, even as the mountains stand "round about Jerusalem."

Religion—the duty of man to his Creator, not sectarianism—was scrupulously taught, and Sunday morning found the family alive in preparations for attending religious service at Zion or Trinity, as it might happen to be the first or the fourth Sunday of the month. From this duty none were exempt from the least to the greatest. The pastor was the friend on whom all troubles both temporal and spiritual were cast, and his visits were long remembered and talked of in the life of each family. Deference to his wishes and reverence for his character were well nigh universal.

> A man he was to all the country dear,
> And passing rich with forty pounds a year;
> Remote from towns, he ran his godly race,
> Nor e'er had changed, nor wished to change his place.
> Unskillful he to fawn, or seek for power,
> By doctrines fashioned to the varying hour;
> Far other aims his heart had learned to prize,
> More bent to raise the wretched than to rise."

Such was the atmosphere in which our deceased friend was reared. He was a trustee in the venerable institution of Washington and Lee University at Lexington, Va., founded by Gen. Washington and presided over by Gen. Robert E. Lee during the last years of his life; he was faithful to the trust, and ever watchful of the best interests of the school. The loss sustained by this institution in his death has been most fittingly expressed in the appended minute of the faculty of the university adopted on the 19th of October, 1891:

At a meeting of the faculty of Washington and Lee University, held October 19, 1891, the following minute was adopted:

Upon the announcement of the death of Gen. W. H. F. Lee the faculty of Washington and Lee University unite in sorrowful sympathy with his family, bereaved of husband, father, and brother, with the Commonwealth in the loss of a patriotic citizen, and with the board of trustees of this university, of which he was an esteemed member.

He was graduated at Harvard for the life of a civilian, but took a commission in the United States Army as lieutenant, and served with fidelity to duty under Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston in the Utah expedition of 1858.

At its close he resigned and returned to his country home, where he continued to live until 1861, when he entered the Confederate Army, and, rising by rapid promotion to the rank of major-general of cavalry, closed his efficient and faithful military career in 1865, when he again returned to country life, and died at the seat of his ancestors at Ravensworth, in Fairfax County.

In the mean time his private life was interrupted by the voice of his people, which called him to their service in the senate of Virginia, and for three terms as their Representative in Congress, two of which he completed, and left the vacancy in the third by his untimely death.

Truth, honor, and courage to do good and to resist evil, sincerity in all relations, and fidelity to all duty, were heirlooms of his race and lineage, which he kept and left untarnished to his posterity.

With a mind strong and vigorous, a judgment sound and well-poised, a calm and self-contained temper which impelled him to the right and restrained him from the wrong, and a moral sense which guided and controlled his purposes and his actions along the path of absolute rectitude, he lived a life adorned by noble virtues and filled with noble deeds. Gentle but firm, decided, and fixed in his convictions, but respectful and deferential to those of others, he was a model of all the splendid qualities which make up the character of a courteous and Christian gentleman.

In addition to all these natural gifts his convictions led him to the profession and practice of a simple and genuine faith in the religion of Christ.

After an honorable military and civil career, in the peace of God and in charity with his fellow men, this worthy son of an illustrious family died the death of the righteous, and in the hope of immortality through Him in whom he believed and trusted.

The faculty therefore declare:

That they have heard of the death of Gen. Lee with deep sorrow, and mourn it as a calamity to his family, his friends, his country, and to this university.

That they tender to his family these expressions of their affectionate esteem for him as a personal friend as well as for his services as a public man, and their sincere sympathy with them in their peculiar and irreparable bereavement.

JNO. L. CAMPBELL,
Clerk of the Faculty.

An intimate association with Gen. Lee in the Fifty-first Congress and as members of the board of trustees of Washington and Lee University at Lexington, Va., and in private life enabled me to form a just estimate of his character and of those personal qualities of head and heart that made him beloved by all who really knew him. While they have been well expressed in the foregoing minute, I may add from my own observation a brief summary of his noble character. His mind was eminently practical and arrived at its conclusions more from an unerring instinct of justice and common sense than through the exacting processes of logic. His judgment was rarely at fault, for his intellect was not swerved by passion or prejudice, but was held in perfect equipoise to receive the truth on both sides of every question. His deference to the opinions of others and his caution in seeking the views of those on whose discretion he relied suggested to some who did not know him that he was hesitating in temperament. This was not true; he sought all the light possible on every subject patiently and earnestly, and when he arrived at his conclusion no man adhered to it more tenaciously or enforced it more earnestly.

As a speaker Gen. Lee possessed many of the attributes of the orator, a gift inherited from his grandfather, Light-Horse Harry Lee. He was graceful in delivery, persuasive in manner, and forcible in argument.

His diction was pure, unpretentious, and simple. His speeches were often embellished with references to ancient and modern history and mythology, with which he seemed to be very familiar.

Dutifulness, I believe, was the most prominent trait of his character. It was the star by which his life was guided. Once persuaded that a certain measure or a certain line of policy was right and he was unflinchingly firm in its support. No burden was too heavy, no privation too severe, if only they were borne along the path of duty.

He exemplified in his life the noble utterance of his distinguished father, "Duty is the sublimest word in the English language."

In politics he was a Democrat, but not a partisan, and he firmly believed that the supremacy of his party was necessary for the good of the country and the welfare of the people. His patriotism was exalted, and his faith in the ultimate triumph of the Right never wavered.

His manly appearance, his gracious but dignified manner, his courtly bearing and pleasing conversation marked him as a gentleman of the "old school," as one of Nature's noblemen.

Any sketch of Gen. Lee would indeed be imperfect that failed to mention his love for little children, and his friends will never fail to recall the tender interest he always manifested in the children of their families, especially in the youngest.

His life, Mr. Speaker, was a truly noble one. It was on the highest plane. His character had no spot or blemish upon it that sweet charity would now consign to oblivion, but it was robust, well-rounded, and symmetrical, open as day. His ambition was not to attain, but to deserve the praise of the good and that higher benediction, to be pronounced by the final Judge of the world, "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou unto the joys of thy Lord."

He was an earnest believer in the Christian faith. The abstruse doctrines of the church formed no part of his creed. His faith was in the Christ, the Saviour of mankind; a faith which illumined his pathway in life, lightening his burdens, exalting his nature, and which sustained him without fear when he met the last enemy of the race as he walked through "the valley of the shadow of death." It was the faith of a little child—

An assured belief
That the procession of our fate, howe'er
Sad or disturbed, is ordered by a Being
Of infinite benevolence and power,
Whose everlasting purposes embrace
All accidents, converting them to Good.

His funeral and burial, Mr. Speaker, will never be forgotten by those who witnessed it. The autumn sun was fast sinking behind the bright curtain of the West, bathing "the mellow autumn fields" of Old Virginia with its purple hues. Untrumpeted by official authority, scores of friends from city, town, village, farm, and cabin gathered at Ravensworth to pay the last sad honor to their beloved friend. White and colored, rich and poor, high and low, soldiers, citizens, and statesmen, all were there.

His body was borne from the house to the ivy-clad family graveyard by the sturdy yeomanry of the neighborhood. In the presence of that vast throng, with uncovered heads, his comrades, who had followed him on many a hard-fought battlefield, performed the last sad rites, and with their own hands filled his grave and planted upon it the "immortelles" of their affection and devotion. Faces that never blanched amid the storm of battle paled; hearts that never quailed in the presence of an enemy broke in the presence of the last enemy of us all, and the silent, pitiless tear which fell from the eye was hidden by the lengthening shadows of the evening, which were fast gathering round the scene.

Beloved friend! farewell and hail!
Removed from sight, yet not afar,
Still through this earthly twilight veil
Thou beamest down, a friendly star.
The prophet's blessing comes to thee,
The crown he holds to view is thine:
Forever more thy memory
In heaven and in our hearts shall shine.

Mr. O'FERRALL. Mr. Speaker, these occasions of tribute-offering in this Hall never fail to impress me with extreme sadness, increase my awe and reverence of Him who holds in the hollow of His hand every moment we live and every breath we draw, and teach me the lesson of our mortality.

These scenes have become very familiar to me, and their frequency reminds me with terrible force that—

All that lives must die,
Passing through nature to eternity.

Most naturally am I more than usually touched and pained by the death of him which now hangs its somber drapery around the walls of our hearts and casts its pall over this Chamber. It is a death within the representative circle of which I am a member. It is the death of a colleague, a friend whose presence in that circle always brought sunshine and never shadow.

Tributes to his memory, clothed in language of beauty and breathing with love and burning with pathos, have already been paid, and others will follow; and now, while I can not hope to charm with the tongue of eloquence or touch the soul with the figures of rhetoric, I come with my tribute.

It will be plain and unadorned, but it will at least have the merit of sincerity, and, like the widow's mite, be all that I can give.

William Henry Fitzhugh Lee of Virginia is no more.

How the name of Lee, whenever uttered wherever chivalry has erected her altar, sends a thrill like an electric current through every fiber of the manly man.

How the name of Virginia has been upon every tongue since Queen Elizabeth, nearly three centuries ago, gave that name to that section around which to-day historic memories linger and traditions and glories cluster as thick "as the stars in the crown of night," the section where Christopher Newport and his devoted followers "builded an altar unto the Lord and in the savage wilderness" deposited the germ of this mighty nation, "and where God blessed them as He blessed Noah and his sons, saying unto them, 'The fear of you shall be upon the red man, upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowl of the air, upon all that moveth upon the earth and upon all the fishes of the sea; into your hands are they delivered.'"

Virginia! The land of legends and lays—the land where the cradle of republican liberty was rocked, and where, in 1765, the first denial was heard of the right of the British Parliament to levy taxes upon the colonies which kindled the fire of patriotic fervor and led to the ever-living, soul-inspiring words of her Henry and the raising up of her Jefferson to heights of imperishable fame, and her Washington to the pinnacle of everlasting renown.

Virginia! The land of battle fields and battle gore, colonial relics and Revolutionary monuments, spotless fame and unsullied honor; the land of patriot soldiers and heroes, and of a Yorktown, where the tyrant's head was bruised and the glorious strife ended which struck from our fathers the fetters and gave to them and their posterity a country gleaming in the golden sunlight of republican liberty, and throwing wide open her gates to the oppressed of every clime.

Virginia! The land of mountains, upon whose summits and in whose gorges the spirit of freedom roams unfettered and unconquerable; the land of valleys, which are hung like alcoved aisles with scenes of heroism and pictures of daring, self-sacrifice, and devotion to principle; the land of rivers and rivulets, which reflect like mirrors the fields upon which her blood has been poured out like water upon the ground; the land of zephyrs and breezes, and where the storm king sometimes dwells gently murmuring or in thunder tones proclaiming her glories and her fame; the land of blue, beautiful skies, radiant with the virtues of her daughters and bespangled with the deeds of her sons; the land of memorials of the past, that inspire the Virginia youth, whether born in poverty or in riches, reared in the cottage humble or in the mansion stately, with a patriotism that knows not section, and yet a State love that knows not bounds.

It was in this land that Richard Henry Lee, the fire and splendor of whose eloquence burned like a hot iron into the soul of tyranny, and Francis Lightfoot Lee, both of them signers of the Declaration of Independence, were born; it was in this land that Arthur Lee, through whose instrumentality the colonies secured the friendship and support of France, and "Light-Horse Harry" Lee, whose legion, following his plume, struck the enemy in the bivouac, on the march, in the lurid glare of battle, on the flank, and in the front like a thunderbolt from the skies, were born. It was in this land that Robert Edward Lee, whose services on the fields of Mexico decked his brow with the warrior's laurel, and whose leadership of the Confederate armies in the unfortunate strife between the States made his name immortal, and whose virtues shine with the brilliancy of a polished diamond, wreath his character in moral grandeur, and draw pæans and praises from friend and foe and from every clime where exalted manhood and a spotless life find devotees, was born; and it was in this land that William Henry Fitzhugh Lee, whose memory we are here to perpetuate, was born—all, all of the same lineage and blood.

What a line of illustrious and distinguished men of one name for one State to produce. What a line of illustrious men to spring from the old cavalier family that under the reign of Charles I settled in the county of Northumberland, between the waters of the Rappahannock and Potomac, since glorified by the pen of the historian and the lyre of the poet.

William Henry Fitzhugh Lee! How sweet does that name sound to me. What recollections does it awaken. How quickly do I find my heart throbbing; how rapidly my blood rushes through its channels.

Less than a twelvemonth ago he sat in yon seat or moved hither and thither about this Hall and along these passageways, pausing here and there to speak a pleasant word or exchange a friendly greeting. His tall and commanding person, his open, frank, and benevolent face and courtly bearing marked him among the membership of this House, and would have marked him in any assemblage, whether in the glittering splendor of royalty or in the plain dignity of our republican institutions. To see him once was to remember him forever. His image is as distinct before me this moment as if he stood in the flesh with his eye beaming forth the goodness of his nature and his hand outstretched, as was his wont, to receive mine.

Mr. Speaker, his illustrious father, when the shadows of Appomattox closed round him, when the darkness of defeat enveloped him, when his soul was rent and torn and his mind was filled with anguish and his ragged and tired and worn veterans reduced to a mere thin skirmish line, the remnant of an army that had shed unfading luster upon the American arms and the American soldier, gathered with tear-moistened cheeks about him to bid him farewell and receive his blessing, gave utterance to a sentiment just quoted by my colleague [Mr. TUCKER], a sentiment as grand and noble as was ever written upon any Roman tablet or carved upon any column of enduring marble that was ever reared in the flood light of glory:

Duty is the sublimest word in our language.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, thus spoke Robert Edward Lee, the soldier, hero, Christian, and philanthropist, and when we come to study the life and character of William Henry Fitzhugh Lee we are impressed with the fact that he took duty as his talismanic word, that it was the star that guided him, and that he followed it as faithfully as the "wise men" followed the star from "the East" to Jerusalem and thence to Bethlehem.

We believe that in his youth, on the heights of Arlington, where his eyes first opened upon the light, he learned at his father's knee and by his father's daily walk and conversation the great lesson of duty which steered his course and pointed out his pathway in life.

He was born, as has been said, on the 31st day of May, 1837. In 1857 he was appointed a second lieutenant in the Sixth Regiment of United States Infantry, and served in 1858 in the then far West under Albert Sidney Johnston, whose fame Shiloh echoes and reëchoes along the banks of the Tennessee. In 1859 he resigned his commission in the Army and returned to Virginia and located on his estate in the county of New Kent. In 1861, when the Southern tocsin sounded and Virginia's voice was heard calling for troops, he raised a cavalry company and joined the Army of Northern Virginia; he rose gradually from captain to major-general of cavalry; was wounded in the terrific engagement at Brandy Station between the Confederate and Federal cavalry on the 9th day of June, 1863; was captured at Hanover Court House, and was confined at Fort Monroe and Fort Lafayette until March, 1864, when he was exchanged, and repaired to his command, and served until the flag which he loved was furled forever at Appomattox. From that time forward he cultivated his large estate with much care, serving one term in the senate of his State, declining a renomination. In 1886 he was elected to the Fiftieth Congress from the Eighth Congressional district of Virginia, and again in 1888 to the Fifty-first Congress, and still again in 1890 to the present Congress.

It was my privilege and pleasure to form his acquaintance in the army and to watch his flashing blade amid the carnage of battle, observe his cool courage and intrepid bearing and the love and confidence of his men upon more than one sanguinary field. He was as calm when the leaden hail was rattling and as cool when the shells were shrieking and bursting as he was upon this floor. He was a leader, not a follower of his men; if they went into the jaws of death, he was at their head. He fared as his men fared; if their haversacks were empty, his was empty; if they laid down in the mud, he laid there too; if they sweltered in the summer heat or shivered in the winter blast, he sweltered or shivered too, and thus it was he kindled in the breasts of his men intense love for himself and secured their implicit confidence in his leadership.

The promotions he received, rising from a captain to a major-general, speak in terms stronger than any words of mine of his courage and valor and his qualities as a soldier and military chieftain.

As a civilian, pursuing the quiet walks of rural life and devoting himself to agriculture, the noblest of all arts, he was honored by all the people and drew to him his neighbors, binding them with the steely bands of constant friendship. His word was as good as his bond, and the dusky son of toil as well as the intelligent tenant on his wide possessions relied upon it with absolute faith, and the most beautiful tribute that could be paid to his memory was the deep sorrow which manifested itself in a meeting after his death of those whose brawny muscle had held the plow handles and whose toil had made the corn and the wheat grow on his rich and fertile fields.

In politics he was a Democrat, and he was as pure in the political arena as in private life. He scorned the ways of the demagogue and the time-server, and believed that "men should be what they seem." In the councils of his State and in the councils of the nation he was found at all times in full accord with the principles and policy of his party.

As a Representative he was as true to his constituents as any subject to his sovereign, laboring in season and out of season to serve them, and even when his strong frame began to weaken and the germs of disease had been planted in his system he disregarded the warning calls for rest and continued to bend all his energies in the discharge of his trust, and I but speak the truth when I say that he fell a martyr to duty.

But, Mr. Speaker, while he was grand as a soldier, pure as a man, exalted as a citizen, and faithful as a Representative, it was in the home circle, as husband and father, and not on the battle field, in civil life, or in the halls of legislation, that the beauty and loveliness of his character cast a halo around him.

He loved home, and it had a charm for him which neither pleasures, honors, nor fame could pluck from his bosom. Blessed by the companionship of one worthy of all adoration, and who presided like a queen over his household, entering into all his joys, sharing all his sorrows, and encouraging all his aspirations, he loved the breezes that kissed her cheeks, the birds that made sweet music to her ear, the rivulets that gently murmured her name, the flowers that shed their fragrance in her bowers, and the stately oaks under which the children of their union had prattled, and the pebbled walks upon which they had played and gamboled.

Yes, he loved home, and in its sacred circle his presence was like a sunbeam, brightening every face and warming every heart. He was all patience, gentleness, kindness, and love, and if there ever was a home which was a fit emblem of heaven it was "Ravensworth," the home of this distinguished man.

Mr. Speaker, he is gone. He lives now only in memory. In October last, when the frosts were blighting and the leaves were falling and the autumnal winds were sighing, after patient waiting for the fatal hour, it came, and God's finger touched him, and the brave soldier, honored citizen, faithful Representative, devoted husband, and affectionate father was dead.

He passed away quietly, strong in Christian faith and in the hope of a blissful eternity.

William Henry Fitzhugh Lee! His State mourns his death. Within the bosom of her soil he rests, peacefully rests. In his ancestral land near by Arlington, historic, revered Arlington, the scene of his childhood and early manhood, he sleeps—sleeps the sleep that knows no waking.

Earth, that all too soon hath bound him,
Gently wrap his clay!
Linger lovingly around him,
Light of dying day!

And Virginia—

Bending lowly,
Still a ceaseless vigil holy
Keep above his dust.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with a beautiful and impressive custom, we put aside for to-day our legislative duties to pay a tribute of respect to the memory of Hon. William H. F. Lee, of Virginia. In November, 1890, he was elected to serve as a member of this Congress from the Eighth district of that State, receiving in that action of his devoted constituents a merited indorsement of his conduct and services as their Representative for the two preceding terms. But when the day for our assembling arrived my colleague was not present to answer to the call of his name. He had passed over the river and was resting under the shade of the trees on the other side. He was beloved and honored by all the people of Virginia, and the announcement of his death, which occurred on the 15th day of October, 1891, was received everywhere within her borders with expressions of the deepest sorrow. He was born at Arlington, on the Virginia Heights, opposite this beautiful city, on the 31st day of May, 1837, and at the time of his death was in the fifty-fifth year of his age.

In 1857, when he was pursuing his studies in the University of Harvard, in preparation for the active and serious duties of life, he received from the then President of the United States the appointment of brevet second lieutenant in the Sixth Infantry. At that time the spirit of resistance to the authority of the National Government was being exhibited to such an extent in Utah as to call for measures of repression. Assassinations and outrages of all kinds were common, and the officers of the United States were powerless either to prevent or punish their commission.

When Mr. Buchanan became President the resolution was formed that the insubordination and conflict of authority existing in that Territory should cease, and the necessary executive and judicial officers having been appointed for the enforcement of the laws of the United States and the preservation of the public peace, it was determined to send a detachment of the Army to protect them against violence and to assist them as a posse comitatus, when necessary, in the performance of their duties. Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston became the commander of this military force and Lieut. Lee had his first experience of the service in this expedition. As the occasion does not call for a recital of the events of that period, I will content myself with the remark that he was then, as on every occasion in after years, faithful to the obligations of duty. His term of service in the Army was of short duration, and from that fact we may infer that he was not enamored with the life of a soldier in time of peace.

In 1859 he resigned his commission, and soon thereafter was married to Miss Wickham, the daughter of a family distinguished in the annals of Virginia. They went to reside at the White House, on the Pamunkey River, in the county of New Kent. It was at this old historic country home that the marriage of George Washington with the Widow Custis was celebrated. It descended to Gen. Lee from his mother, who was the great-granddaughter of Washington's wife.

Here he devoted himself to the tillage of the soil and became engrossed with the pursuits of a plain and unostentatious farmer. His condition and surroundings at this time were such as to invite contentment, and encourage the cultivation of those pure and lofty sentiments for which he was ever distinguished.

Being in the flower and strength of his young manhood, and blessed with affluence and the love of an accomplished wife, there seemed wanting nothing to make his home an earthly paradise.

But the course of this peaceful and happy life was not to run thus smoothly to the end. Dark and threatening clouds of war soon lowered upon our land, and the political conflicts and antagonisms, which had grown in intensity and bitterness with the flight of years, ripened into civil war in 1861. The crisis then arrived when the appeal to arms was inevitable, and with it the necessity that all men should decide whether allegiance was first due to the State or General Government. There were honest differences of opinion on this question, which had existed from the very foundation of the Republic.

He was connected by blood with a long line of illustrious men, who had borne a conspicuous part in the events which led to the declaration of American independence and the establishment of this constitutional Government. It was Richard Henry Lee who offered in the Continental Congress, in June, 1776, that stirring resolution which proclaimed to the world "that these united colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British Crown; and that all political connection between them and Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved."

It was his own grandfather, known in history as "Light-Horse Harry Lee," who, in the long struggle which followed this bold declaration, struck such sturdy blows for the liberties and rights of his countrymen as caused him to receive the special commendation of George Washington, of whom in turn he uttered these memorable words, "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." Bearing a name thus associated with all the glorious achievements of the past, it was but natural that he should have felt an ardent attachment to the Union. But he was a son of Virginia, "where American liberty raised its first voice, and where its youth was nurtured and sustained."

There the doctrine of the sovereignty of the State was accepted as the true interpretation of the Constitution almost without division of sentiment. Her people held that allegiance was first due to their State, and while all deplored the necessity for, few, if any, doubted as to the right of separation. When in April, 1861, a convention representing her people passed the ordinance of secession, he felt no hesitation in adopting his course. He resolved at once to consecrate himself and his sword to the sacred duty of defending her homes and firesides.

Having raised a company of cavalry, he was made its captain, and was rapidly promoted from rank to rank until he reached that of major-general. Soon after his entry into the Confederate service he became associated with the command of Gen. J. E. B. Stuart, and participated thereafter in nearly all the movements of that fearless and dashing leader, whom the brave Gen. Sedgwick, of the United States Army, pronounced "the best cavalry officer ever foaled in North America." On June 3, 1862, Gen. Robert E. Lee, the father of my deceased colleague, assumed the command of the Army of Northern Virginia, three days after the retiracy of Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, caused by a wound received in the battle of Seven Pines.

The plans of the Federal commander for the capture of the capital of the Southern Confederacy had been well chosen. His army, according to his own report, numbered 156,000, of whom 115,000 were ready for duty as fighting men. All the vast resources of his Government were being employed to enable him to prosecute his campaign with efficiency and vigor. His troops had been furnished with artillery and small arms of the most approved description and best patterns. They had abundance of ammunition of the finest quality and ample supplies of food and clothing. Gen. McDowell, then at Fredericksburg with 40,000 men, and Gens. Banks and Frémont in the valley of Virginia, were expected to coöperate in the movement. A line of fire was slowly but steadily being drawn around Richmond. These plans, as I have said, had been well conceived, and were being executed with great precision and skill.

To oppose this formidable advance there were less than 100,000 fighting men in Virginia, and they were greatly inferior to the enemy in both equipments and supplies. Gen. Johnston, penetrating the designs of his adversary, commenced operations to prevent their accomplishment. The bloody and stubbornly contested battle of "Seven Pines" was fought in part execution of his plans. When Gen. Robert E. Lee succeeded to the command, it was apparent that some decisive blow must be struck to save the Southern capital from a state of siege. Surveying the whole field with a keen and practiced eye, he saw that the left wing of the Union army, which had been thrown across the Chickahominy and advanced to within four or five miles of Richmond, occupied a strong and almost impregnable position. An attack upon the center promised no better results.

Under these circumstances he turned his attention to the right wing, and in order to obtain the fullest and most accurate information concerning McClellan's position and defenses on that portion of his line, ordered Gen. Stuart to make a reconnoisance in the direction of Old Church and Cold Harbor. With 1,500 picked men, that pink of Southern chivalry immediately undertook the execution of the orders of the commanding general. This daring exploit was popularly known as "Stuart's ride around McClellan." It is a fact that he did pass entirely around the Union army, and, building a bridge across the Chickahominy, reëntered the Confederate lines in safety. In this perilous expedition he was assisted by his bravest and best officers, among whom were Gens. William H. F. Lee, and his cousin, the dashing Fitz Lee.

More was accomplished than had been anticipated, and it was ascertained that the right and rear of McClellan were unprotected by works of any strength. In consequence of the information thus obtained the decision was formed to make the attack in that direction, and on the 26th of June, 1862, began that series of splendid battles which culminated in the retreat of McClellan's army to Harrison's Landing, on the James River, and the deliverance of Richmond from danger. On the 9th of June, 1863, there occurred near Brandy Station, in the county of Culpeper, Va., one of the most extensive and stubborn cavalry fights of the whole war. Two divisions of Federal cavalry, commanded by Gens. Buford and Gregg, and supported by two brigades of "picked infantry," fell upon Stuart with such suddenness and fierceness that the attack was almost crowned with victory. Nothing saved him from defeat, if not from greater calamity, but his own coolness and that of his lieutenants, coupled with the indomitable pluck and intrepidity of his troopers.

In this engagement that brave Georgian, Gen. Young, formerly a member of this House, by a splendid charge, with sabers, without carbine or pistol, repulsed a dangerous and gallant assault on the rear, while Gen. William H. F. Lee, with equal courage and dash, protected the left of the Confederate position. In this encounter Gen. Lee received a severe wound, which necessitated his retirement from the field. He was carried to Hickory Hill, in Hanover County, the home of Gen. Wickham, a near relative of his wife, and here he was captured and placed in solitary confinement in Fortress Monroe as a hostage, certain officers of the United States being then held under sentence of death in Libby Prison in retaliation for the execution of certain Confederate officers in the West.

Gen. Custis Lee, being then a young unmarried man on the staff of the Confederate President, met, under special flag of truce, representatives of the Government at Washington, and begged to be permitted to take the place of Gen. William H. F. Lee, giving as the reason for the proposed exchange his desire to save from punishment the innocent wife and children of his wounded brother. The offer was declined, and he was told that the burdens of war must fall where chance or fortune placed them.

In this incident we have a beautiful and touching illustration of the strength and warmth of brotherly love and of the knightly bearing of the Lees of Virginia. While thus detained as a prisoner of war, racked with physical sufferings and those mental tortures which a sensitive and high-strung man must feel under such circumstances, there came the sad tidings of the death of his loved wife and two children. And thus was added another, the most poignant of all the griefs with which he had been afflicted. His old Virginia home, associated with so many sacred memories, had been reduced to ashes, and now there remained of the once happy family which formerly occupied it only the captive father. This weight of woe would seem too much for human endurance, but he bore it with the fortitude of a Christian soldier. He was exchanged in the spring of 1864, and returning to his division, led it in all the engagements, from the Rapidan to the Appomatox, where the curtain fell upon the stirring and bloody scenes in which he had been such an active participant.

As a soldier he was always calm, cool, and self-possessed. Those who have had experience in the ranks know that the bravest and best soldiers will falter and hesitate when they are without confidence in the ability, judgment, and foresight of their leader. The soldiers who were ranged under the standard of Lee, believing that their noble commander was equal to all emergencies, followed him with unwavering trust; and their survivors testify to the affection in which a spirit so gentle and yet so brave was held.

No higher eulogy can be pronounced upon any man than to say of him that which can be truly alleged of Gen. Lee, that he was an honored and trusted leader in that splendid Army of Northern Virginia, which only failed where success was impossible. They challenged the respect and admiration of the world, and of their great captain it has been said that "a country which has given birth to men like him and those who followed him may look the chivalry of Europe in the face without shame, for the fatherlands of Sidney and Bayard never produced a nobler soldier, gentleman, and Christian than Robert E. Lee."

These meager details of our civil war have not been given with the purpose of reviving unpleasant memories or of perpetuating sectional animosities. They have been related because they constitute an important part of the story of the life of him whom we mourn.

On both sides were displayed the highest qualities of the military leader, and illustrated as never before the pluck, endurance, and dash of the American soldier. They were Americans all, and without distinction of sections we can claim part of the honor of their achievements and partake in the pride of their great names. We have furnished to the world the indubitable proof that these States united are invincible. When, at Appomattox, our arms were stacked and banners furled, we returned to our homes with no divided allegiance.

We believe that in the safety of the Union is the safety of the States. And we rejoice that "the gorgeous ensign of the Republic is still full high advanced, its arms and trophies streaming in their original luster, not a stripe erased or polluted, not a single star obscured, bearing for its motto no such miserable interrogatory as 'What is all this worth?' Nor those other words of delusion and folly, 'Liberty first and Union afterwards,' but everywhere, spread all over in characters of living light, blazing on all its ample folds, as they float over the sea and over the land and in every wind under the whole heavens, that other sentiment, dear to every true American heart, 'Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable.'"

But while entertaining these sentiments, we can not, we will not, forget our glorious dead. The brave men against whom we fought neither expect nor desire such unnatural conduct. Whether the cause for which they died was just or not it would be idle to discuss. It is enough for us to know that—

> They were slain for us,
> And their blood flowed out in a rain for us—
> Red, rich, and pure, on the plain for us;
> And years may go,
> But our tears shall flow
> O'er the dead who have died in vain for us.

After the cessation of hostilities Gen. Lee resumed the occupations of a farmer on the old plantation which he had left in 1861. The implements of warfare were exchanged for those of the husbandman, and following the plow in the furrows he commenced the work of repairing the losses he had sustained. In 1868 he married Miss Mary Tabb Bolling, the daughter of Col. George W. Bolling, of Petersburg, and they continued their residence at the White House until 1874, when they removed to Ravensworth, in the county of Fairfax, where he died.

He was an able and faithful Representative, and always devoted to the interests of his constituents. As a fitting eulogy to his worth, it may be truly said that it was his disposition to follow the line of duty to the end. The conscientious performance of every trust confided to him was the watchword of his life. In his conduct as a legislator he was never ruled by faction or interest, but the promotion of the public good was the motive of all his actions. While exhibiting none of the showy and sparkling qualities of the orator, he was distinguished for the possession of good judgment and strong, practical common sense. He was a man of calm and even temperament, and was seldom, if ever, controlled by prejudices or swayed by passions. Those who were associated with him here remember his dignified and courteous bearing. No words of bitterness or reproach ever escaped his lips, and he never forgot what was due to others as well as to himself.

I never heard him speak an unkind word of another, and while reserved, and to a certain extent formal, in his demeanor, he was a man of infinite sweetness of disposition:

> And thus he bore without abuse,
> The grand old name of gentleman.

Both in his public and private life he furnished an example worthy of the emulation of all who love the true nobility of humanity. We will draw aside the curtain only for a passing glance at the domestic circle, of which his beautiful and lovely wife was at once the pride and the ornament. Surrounded by this devoted helpmeet and two manly sons, there was not a happier home in old Virginia. Warmed by the love of his big and generous heart, it was the abode of contentment and peace. The dread messenger was never more unwelcome than when he entered the portals of Ravensworth and made vacant forever the chair of the husband and the father.

We can say nothing to assuage the poignant grief of the widow and children, but our hearts are filled with the fervent prayer that Heaven's choicest blessings may be showered upon them.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, in this brief tribute to the memory of Gen. W. H. F. Lee I should be unworthy of the friendship which it was my privilege to claim did I indulge in anything else than the language of soberness and truth. In him there was no manner of affectation; he pretended to be nothing but such as he was, and it is certain that if he had been giving directions to his biographer he would have laid down the rule announced by Thomas Carlyle in his Review of the life of Lockhart, that the biographer in the treatment of his subject "should have the fear of God before his eyes and no other fear whatever."

Froude, as biographer, claims subsequently to have applied to the life of Carlyle his own rule; and all the world now knows that in the portrayal Carlyle's faults of character the biographer left many a sting in the hearts of those who had loved the great man while he lived, and who felt that the failings, on which the historian had dwelt, ought to have been interred with his bones. The biographer who shall perform faithfully the task of writing the life of "Rooney" Lee will not paint him as a genius like Carlyle; but, sir, if there was any single feature in the character of our friend that laid bare to the world, even by the bold hand of an Anthony Froude, would cause the faintest blush to tinge the cheek of family or friends, I, who knew him well, do not know what it was.

It is true, sir, that it was not my fortune to be thrown in contact with him in the earlier years of his life. I did not know him when his character was being shaped and molded by the generous and refining influences which surrounded him from his cradle to his manhood.

My personal acquaintance with him may be said to have begun only when he had taken his seat by my side in this Hall. But his fame had come before him. A representative of the most distinguished family in America, he had been, by this circumstance alone, conspicuous from his birth; and yet he came among us with not a spot upon his name.

During the civil war, from a subordinate position rising rapidly to high command, and always in the bright light that surrounded him as a son of the most illustrious general of modern times, he bore himself as a soldier without reproach. Neither in civil life nor in war had calumny assaulted him. Such a man, entering here upon a new career, attracted attention the moment he came into this Hall.

It soon appeared to those who watched him closely that he was singulary modest. This modesty was not diffidence. He was at all times self-poised. On this floor, addressing himself to a public question, just as in private conversation among his friends, he always had the easy, unpretentious manner of the thoroughbred gentleman, but his modesty was easily apparent in an utter lack of self-assertion. He never put himself forward except when duty prompted, and then he did nothing for display; never a word did he speak for himself, but only for his cause.

He made indeed no pretensions to oratory; he had never been trained in its arts; but his mind was broad and highly cultured, he had a vast fund of vigorous common sense, and he expressed himself readily and pointedly. With these faculties he would in time have taken rank as a strong debater.

While broadly patriotic, he had at the same time a high sense of obligation to his immediate constituency, and he was patient to a remarkable degree. His district, you will remember, Mr. Speaker, lay just beyond the Potomac.

It was an easy matter for his constituents to come to the Capitol, and, naturally, many of them, sought office at his hands. I sat near him in the Fifty-first Congress. Often have I known him to be carded out a dozen times a day; and, if he ever expressed himself to me as worried by these interruptions, he never failed to show, by what he said, that his annoyance arose not so much from the importunities of his friends as from his inability to serve them.

In address he was remarkably pleasing. Indeed, his manner was so genial, so pleasant, so hearty and sincere, that the memory of his kindly greeting will not be forgotten until the whole generation of his friends shall pass away. Who is there among his associates on this floor that will ever cease to remember him as morning after morning in the springtime he came into this Hall bringing from his home a basket of roses to distribute among his friends? He was not seeking popularity; such a thought had not occurred to him, nor did it enter into the mind of any one here. He simply loved his friends and he loved flowers, just as he loved all things beautiful and true.

Such a man could not but be, as Gen. Lee was, a model brother, husband, and father. In all his life nothing was more lovely and beautiful than his family relations.

He had about him none of the arts of the demagogue; he was always himself, and therefore never false to any man. His whole walk and conversation illustrated that he was the worthy son of his noble father; that from his youth up he had profited by the precepts and example of that illustrious chieftain, who declared, in those memorable words already quoted by my eloquent friend [Mr. TUCKER], that duty was the sublimest word in the English language. And, Mr. Speaker, let me say that the idea conveyed by this word duty, as taught by the father and practiced by the son, was far higher than that ideal, lofty though it was, expounded by philosophers like Plato and Cicero. With the Lees duty meant Christian duty.

With all these characteristics Gen. Lee could not but grow and continue to grow as he did in power and influence in a body like this; and had he been spared for that long career in this Hall hoped for by his friends he would have risen to eminence as a legislator.

But this was not to be. He has passed away from us forever. When such a man dies out from among us, let critics cavil as they may about time wasted in memorial addresses. We should do violence to our own feelings did we not pause to honor his memory; we should do wrong to the American people, whose heritage they are, did we not spread before them the lessons of his life, that the whole country may venerate his virtues and the youth of the land may emulate his example.

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Speaker, of all picturesque spots on the face of the earth there is, perhaps, none that can rival in scenic beauty Mount Arlington, in the State of Virginia. Shaded by the primeval forest to the rear, and in front beautified by the gently sloping lawn, decorated by variegated flowers and artistically trimmed shrubbery, with the dark green waters of the Potomac ebbing and flowing not far away, and in full view the mighty nation's splendid capital city, stands the stately old mansion, with its classic columns, where, nearly fifty-five years ago, was born our departed friend and colleague, and one of the beloved representatives of the people of Virginia—Gen. W. H. F. Lee. Born in Virginia, he remained a Virginian continuously to the hour of his death.

Inheriting the martial genius of his eminent ancestry, he early aspired to a career in the military service of his country, and at the comparatively early age of 20 we find him bidding adieu to his college studies at Harvard and uniting with the army in its expedition to Utah in 1858, when he first experienced the fatigues and hardships incident to the life of the soldier in the long march over the arid plains and through the mountain canyons into the Mormon territory. The prospect of inaction, with a long period in garrison, proved a disappointment to so ambitious a spirit, and he resigned his commission and returned to the domestic welcome of his Virginia farm.

Soon, however, the indication of a long peace proved delusive, and the scene shifted. This time it was decreed that he should behold the terrible conflict in which one portion of his unhappy country was to engage in deadly array with another portion. Obeying what he conceived to be the mandate of his State, he followed the impulse of his feelings and the example of his kindred and his friends and periled all in that belief. He participated at once, and most actively, in some of the most sanguinary engagements of the civil war. Wounded at one place, taken prisoner at another, then exchanged, and again in the van of battle, we find him following the forlorn hope until the close of the struggle at Appomattox, when he again returned to the old farm. He possessed the undivided confidence of his constituents.

He was regarded by them, as he was so long observed by us in our intimate associations with him in this Hall, and especially in the committee rooms, as an intelligent and conscientious legislator, a laborious servant of the people, a courtly gentleman, a generous and devoted companion. Loyal as he was to his political convictions, he was yet the most considerate and the most conservative in his relations with those who radically differed with him. He admired frankness; he despised duplicity. While he was obedient to the reasonable edicts of caucus and party organization, we recall occasions when he was prompt to rise above the partisan. He was as broad-gauge and comprehensive in the study and performance of his duty toward all parts and all interests of his reunited country, as he was anxious for the obliteration of sectional animosity and sincere and generous of heart in his social obligations to all of his fellow-men.

The most touching remembrance we bear of Gen. Lee's goodness of heart has reference to his custom in springtime of bringing to this Hall from his farm great quantities of lovely roses, and having them distributed to his associates of both political parties on this floor with his compliments. Here we have a practical illustration that flowers are the interpreters of man's best feelings. In oriental lands the language of flowers was early studied and made expressive. As Percival says:

> Each blossom that blooms in their garden bowers,
> On its leaves a mystic language bears.

With Gen. Lee they bore tidings of good will to partisan friend and partisan foe alike. They bespoke in mute eloquence the expansive heart of one "that loved his fellow-men." Little, however, did he think at the time that these beautiful roses were especially speaking to him as emblems of a near immortality. Awakening from their sleep of winter, they were also harbingers of a brighter day to him and of the bloom of a glorious resurrection. The Germans have a saying "that he who loves flowers loves God." If this be applied to Gen. Lee, we have the blessed assurance that he has approached close to the celestial throne.

Gen. Lee belonged to one of the most historic families of America. Looking back to the early settlement and the pioneer struggles of the peninsula, and then through the plantation and colonial period of entire Virginia, we everywhere discover the genius, the dauntless courage, the independence, and the resolute patriotism of the Lees. It has well been said, sir, that Virginia is the mother of Presidents; and this is true. A momentary reflection does not suffice to demonstrate the various causes which combine to bestow upon the Old Dominion this prominence. A mature study, however, will serve a double purpose. It will teach us not only how Virginia, more than any other State, became the nursery for Presidents and statesmen, but how at the same time was given character and fame to its distinguished family of the Lees.

The permanency and prosperity of States and political bodies are as much due to the character of their superstructures as are the strength and stability of the material edifice to the foundation upon which it rests. The Argonauts of Virginia united in a remarkable degree the pride and culture and learning and loyalty of the cavaliers, with the conviction of purpose and martial courage and discipline of the followers of Cromwell. First came the heroic vanguard—the men like Capt. John Smith—who blazed the way through the forests of the James, the York, the Chickahominy, and Pamunky. Then followed the refined, enthusiastic, and chivalric gentlemen of the polished court of Charles I, with many of the clergy, who brought with them their intense loyalty to the Crown, as well as to the episcopal government and the Anglican ritual. Among these, too, were the proselyted royalists, old and honorable families, after the defeat of Charles, seeking exile in the far distant, yet faithful Virginia. Then came those who triumphed at Naseby and overthrew the kingly office, and maintained the constitution of the realm and the integrity of Magna Charta and the Petition of Right.

The necessity for self-defense and the maintenance of order originated self-government and the assertion of individual right, and these united the widely variant elements of the community in a loyal union. It was the amalgamation of such spirits in Virginia in 1676 which demanded the right of personal liberty, of universal suffrage, and of representation, and here was fought the prelude of that great drama one hundred years later, when a Virginian, in the name of a whole nation, penned the immortal words which proclaimed to all the world the "inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Here were the Lees, the Patrick Henrys, the Randolphs, the Jeffersons, the Madisons, and the Masons of Virginia, and here, to close the drama with freedom's triumphant army, was the most illustrious of them all—George Washington. It was from such an ancestry our late colleague was descended, and it was from such teachings and such examples he imbibed his zealous convictions of right and his sturdy regard for the exalted prerogatives of a free people.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, on the 15th of last October death again invaded the ranks of this House. The mysterious messenger laid the summons of his cold, silent hand upon one who had immeasurably endeared himself to all whose good fortune it had been to know him. To-day we pause amid the rush of a nation's public business to mourn the country's loss and to pay a just tribute to the noble dead. When such a man as our late colleague, Gen. W. H. F. Lee, is taken from our midst, a void is made which can nevermore be filled. It is not his visible presence or his tangible body that we shall so much miss. It is the magnetism of a pure mind, the silent potent influence of a spotless character, the power of a great, good, and noble soul to elevate and dignify all with whom it came in contact, that will prove our irreparable loss. No man ever associated with Gen. Lee without feeling the better for it. To have been with him made you feel like one who had drawn a long, deep inspiration of pure, fresh air into his lungs after breathing the stifling atmosphere of a close room. His thoughts, his conversation, his ideas, diffused about him a sound and healthy morality that was as natural to him as its delicate odor is to the rose. Modest and as gentle as a woman; sympathetic as a child; guileless as the day; a logical, well-trained, accurate mind; a horror of injustice; absolutely devoid of resentment; a benignant countenance, and a splendid physique, made him indeed a man among men.

Sir, I believe not only in early training but in the force of early surroundings and family traditions. Sprung from an illustrious line of statesmen and patriots, who had left their impress on every page of the history, civil and military, of this country from the colonial days to the present; born on those beautiful heights overlooking this city, at Arlington, where the house was filled with the sanctified relics and the very atmosphere he breathed in childhood was pregnant with the traditions and precepts of "the Father of his Country;" his mother the direct descendant and heir of the adopted son of that "illustrious citizen;" his father that world-renowned military commander, the self-poised, calm, patient, dignified, glorious Gen. Robert E. Lee, it would be unnatural not to expect to find the impress of all these on the heart and mind and character and life of Gen. W. H. F. Lee.

To some my words of eulogy may appear fulsome; but having known him in public and in private, at home by his own fireside, as well as abroad on the active field of life, I know that my poor words can but fail to do full justice to his true worth. With him the performance of duty was accompanied by no harsh word or cynical expression; on the contrary, his calmness and uniform sweetness of manner were almost poetical. I recall a notable instance in the Fiftieth Congress, when pressing under the most trying circumstances the passage of a bill for the relief of the Episcopal High School near Alexandria he was temperate and patient. Standing on the Republican side of this Hall, among those who questioned him, his words fell softly and evenly as snowflakes on the turbulent House, which finally by an almost unanimous vote passed his bill.

He shrank from publicity; therefore he never spoke on this floor unless it was necessary to push a measure intrusted to his charge; then he always acquitted himself with credit. In the committee and among his colleagues his influence was irresistible, because his judgment and integrity were above dispute. With him a public office was a public trust, which he accepted and administered for his State and his constituents without regard to race, color, or party affiliation. Many times have I seen him, when coming in from his country home in the morning, met at the depot by a dozen or more of his constituents, claiming his attention to their private matters with the Departments of the Government.

The patience and tender care with which he heard and looked after each was paternal and pathetic. His love for little children was intense and beautiful. Nothing made him happier than to fill some little fellow's hands and pockets with candies and fruits, claiming only in return a shy caress. In his home is where his perfectly balanced Christian character shone in its brightest light. As father and husband he was indeed a model man.

I shall attempt no extended biographical sketch; that has already been well done by others. Yet I can not refrain from saying that in every stage of his career Gen. Lee did his whole duty, actuated entirely and solely by the loftiest motives. A graduate of Harvard at 20, he was appointed a second lieutenant in the regular Army. Often I have heard him tell of the wearisome march across the plains to California with his regiment, long in advance of civilization and railroads, when most of that journey through the desert was made perilous by roving bands of hostile Indians. Retiring from the Army, he married and settled at the historic White House in Lower Virginia. There he was the typical Southern country gentleman of refinement and culture, taking an active interest in agriculture and the public affairs of his community. When the war between the States summoned Virginia's sons to her defense, he again became a soldier.

Throughout the struggle he discharged every duty and was equal to every responsibility placed upon him. His soldiers loved and trusted him as a father, for they knew he would sacrifice no life for empty glory. The saddest chapter in all his life was when, a prisoner of war at Fortress Monroe, lying desperately wounded, with the threat of a retaliatory death-sentence suspended over his head, in hourly expectation of its execution, he heard of the fatal illness of his wife and two little children but a few miles away. Earnestly his friends begged that he might be allowed to go and say the last farewell to them on earth. A devoted brother came like Damon of old, and offered himself to die in "Rooney's" place. War, inexorable war, always stern and cruel, would not accept the substituted sacrifice, and while the sick, wounded soldier, under sentence of death, lay, himself almost dying, in the dungeon of the fortress, his wife and children "passed over the river to rest under the trees," and wait there his coming. Yet no word of reproach ever passed his gentle lips. He accepted it all as the fortune of war.

In all the walks of life, as a student at college, as an officer in the regular Army, as a planter on the Pamunkey, as a leader of cavalry in the civil war, as a farmer struggling with the chaos and confusion that beset him under the new order of things following the abolition of slavery, as president of the Virginia Agricultural Society, as State senator, and as a member of Congress, Gen. W. H. F. Lee met every requirement, was equal to every emergency, and left a name for honor, truth, and virtue which should be a blessed heritage and the inspiration for a nobler and loftier life to all those who shall succeed him.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose at this time to make any extended remarks upon the life and public service of the late Gen. William H. F. Lee. Other gentlemen of the House, more intimately acquainted with Gen. Lee in his lifetime, are better prepared to do justice to his memory than I am. But having enjoyed a very pleasant acquaintance with the deceased during his four years' service as a member of this body, I desire to express the great respect which I entertained for him as a gentleman of high character and of noble, manly qualities. Descended from one of the most highly honored families in the State in which he had his birth, he was liberally educated, and at an early age entered the Army as a second lieutenant, and served as such until 1859, when he resigned his commission and returned to the peaceful pursuits of civil life. In 1861 he followed his illustrious father, and entered the service of the Confederate States as a captain of cavalry. That he was a brave and gallant soldier there can be no doubt, for his military history shows that he rose step by step from the rank of a captain to that of a major-general of cavalry. In 1865 he surrendered with his father at Appomattox, and renewed his allegiance and devotion, as I am glad to believe, to the Government of the United States.

I can but wish, Mr. Speaker, that such honored names as those of Gen. William H. F. Lee and his distinguished father had never been led into rebellion against the Government of their country. But they felt it to be their duty to follow the fortunes of their State, and let us to-day, while mourning the departure of our deceased friend, rejoice that the surrender at Appomattox has been followed by a restored Union, and that our reunited, undivided country is now one of the strongest, most powerful and prosperous of all the nations of the earth.

As a Representative in this body, while he was not inclined to participate actively in the discussion of public and political questions, still Gen. Lee took great interest in all that pertained to the public welfare, and especially in that which, in his judgment, was in the interest of his immediate constituents. He was an able, faithful, and efficient Representative as well as a noble, manly man, and in all my intercourse with men I never met a more genial, warm-hearted, pleasant gentleman than the distinguished citizen to whose memory we pay tribute to-day. I well remember his kindly greetings, and I am sure all of us who knew Gen. Lee deeply regret his loss as a member of this body to which he was for a third time elected by his confiding constituents, and extend to his sorrowing, bereaved family our warm, heartfelt sympathies.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have not been in the habit of speaking upon occasions of this kind, but it is one of the joys of my life, a very great joy indeed, to feel that I had a place in the heart of the gentleman whom we are now commemorating. I knew him very well, and in many respects I regarded him as one of the most fortunate men whom it was ever my pleasure to know. While many men here are struggling for fame, while many of them will leave the struggle heartsick, weary, defeated, he had that power, that charm, so precious and so lovely, of attaching men to him by the ties of affection. Little children loved him.

There was a benignancy, a sweetness of demeanor, which attracted them to him, and while his name may not be sounded in the trump of fame, yet the subtle power of his gentleness and goodness has permeated many lives, will shape many destinies, and will have a force in the history of the world greater than that which will be exerted by many who will succeed him here. He was a soldier, yet he was gentle and kind. He was a descendant of a long line of honored ancestry, yet he did not believe that mere wealth was necessary either to respectability or to greatness. He was a farmer and loved the soil. He looked upon the ripened grain as the flower of human hope and as a minister to human needs. He loved the breath of cattle, and he regarded the occupation of an agriculturist as the noblest and the best in which a man could be engaged. He was a true son of the soil—hearty, simple, gentle, true.

But, sir, the particulars of his career, both public and private, have been recounted by those who knew him well; have been recounted with great force, with great eloquence, and propriety. There is, however, one part of that career to which I wish to refer. He was engaged in the memorable struggle which convulsed this nation from center to circumference and which fastened the gaze of the civilized world. I wish, upon this occasion, to say emphatically that, wherever we may have stood in that struggle, whatever was good and great in any man participating on either side of it is a precious heritage to the entire American people to-day. We proved that north, south, east, west, we had not degenerated in the qualities which make a nation great.

Grant and Lee, Sherman, Sheridan, and the two Johnstons have gone from us forever, and every day the green sward of peace, the flowers of affection, are placed above the grave of some hero of the blue or of the gray. But I love to think that above these graves stands the Genius of American freedom, serene and grand, and bids the world behold how brave the sons of the Republic were in the past; how united they are in one purpose and one destiny in the present; how certain they are to be a people noted for reasonable liberty, for perfect union, and for sufficient material power to be formidable and just alike to the other nations of the earth.

And so, sir, I come and lay the flowers of my Northern home upon the bier of this son of Virginia, this good citizen, this patriot, this man who, I am proud to believe, held even me in his affection. And when gentlemen here speak of the terror and the mystery of death, I tell them that to such a man death has no terrors, and that to the good man it has no mystery; for in that illimitable hereafter, which must be populated by all the sons of men, it must be, it will be, well with all of us.

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the House has already heard from his friend and successor the story of Gen. Lee's life. I shall not, therefore, repeat it even in briefest outline. Enough for me to say that he was one in a long lineage of noted men, who by some innate force and virtue had stood forth in three generations as leaders of their fellow-men; that he was the son of the greatest of all who have borne the name, and that in early manhood he exhibited the soldierly instincts and the soldierly capacity that seemed to be historically associated with it.

With such a lineage and with such a history he came to this House, and I believe I can offer no higher tribute to his memory to-day than to say that in all his associations with us here he was the embodiment of gentleness and modesty. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, as I now recall Gen. Lee, and explore with aching heart the memory of a close and cordial friendship with him, I can say with confidence that in the blending of these rare traits I have never known his equal. They were a part of his nature, not more illustrated in business and social intercourse with fellow-members than in his relations with the page who did him service and who learned to regard himself in some way as the special friend and associate of Gen. Lee.

Many of us doubtless can recall the evident pride of the little fellow who occasionally placed upon our desks the roses which his kindly patron brought by the basketful in the spring mornings from his Virginia home to brighten the sittings of the House. And this gentleness and modesty were the more attractive because they were the adornment of a sincere and manly character. How much came to him as the rich legacy of ancestral blood and how much was wrought into his nature by the training of his youth it is idle to speculate. In both respects he was lifted far above the common lot of men. Of his mother it is said by those who knew her well that she was one of the most accomplished and at the same time most domestic, sensible, and practical of women. Of his father's influence and teaching, to say nothing of his lofty example, we have the striking proofs, if any were needed, in letters that have been published. Let me cull but an occasional expression from these unaffected outpourings of the heart of Robert E. Lee toward the son he loved so well, "My precious Roon," as he was wont to call him.

When the boy was not yet 10 years of age he closes a playful letter, adapted to such tender years, with these earnest words: "Be true, kind, and generous, and pray earnestly to God to enable you to keep His commandments and to walk in the same all the days of your life." A year later, writing from the ship Massachusetts, off Lobos, to his two sons, a letter full of interest to boys, he urges them to diligence in study: "I shall not feel my long separation from you if I find that my absence has been of no injury to you, and that you have both grown in goodness and knowledge as well as in stature; but how I shall suffer on my return if the reverse has occurred. You enter into all my thoughts, into all my prayers, and on you in part will depend whether I shall be happy or miserable, as you know how much I love you."

Ten years later, when the son had become a lieutenant in the Army, he admonishes him, "I hope you will always be distinguished for your avoidance of the universal balm, whisky, and every immorality. Nor need you fear to be ruled out of the society that indulges in it, for you will acquire their esteem and respect, as all venerate, if they do not practice, virtue. I hope you will make many friends, as you will be thrown with those who deserve this feeling. But indiscriminate intimacies you will find annoying and entangling, and they can be avoided by politeness and civility. When I think of your youth, impulsiveness, and many temptations, your distance from me, and the ease (and even innocence) with which you might commence an erroneous course, my heart quails within me and my whole frame and being tremble at the possible result. May Almighty God have you in His holy keeping. To His merciful providence I commit you, and I will rely upon Him and the efficacy of the prayers that will be daily and hourly offered up by those who love you."

A year or two later on New Year's day, 1859, he writes: "I always thought there was stuff in you for a good soldier and I trust you will prove it. I can not express the gratification I felt in meeting Col. May in New York at the encomium he passed upon your soldiership, your zeal, and your devotion to your duty. But I was more pleased at the report of your conduct; that went more to my heart and was of infinite comfort to me. Hold on to your purity and virtue; they will proudly sustain you in all trials and difficulties and cheer you in every calamity."

So, too, when the young lieutenant had married and settled down a typical Virginian farmer upon the estate left him by his grandfather Custis, the well-known "White House," on the Pamunkey, the home of Martha Washington:

I am glad to hear that your mechanics are all paid off and that you have managed your funds so well as to have enough for your purposes. As you have commenced, I hope you will continue never to exceed your means. It will save you much anxiety and mortification and enable you to maintain your independence of character and feeling. It is easier to make our wishes conform to our means than to make our means conform to our wishes. In fact, we want but little. Our happiness depends upon our independence, the success of our operations, prosperity of our plans, health, contentment, and the esteem of our friends, all of which, my dear son, I hope you may enjoy to the full. * * *

With such counsels, glowing with a father's love and enforced by the constant example of a father's life, it is no wonder that the son grew into the manliness, the gentleness and modesty, the charitableness of judgment, the unconspicuous and patient devotion to duty, and the personal lovableness of Gen. Lee.

Mr. Speaker, I might say much more from the promptings of a strong and unfeigned affection and from a sense of the public merits of our late colleague, but where there are so many to speak it is not necessary for one to attempt a catalogue of his private virtues and of his public services.

Perhaps I may fitly add a word in closing as to Gen. Lee's military career. From a captain of volunteer cavalry he rose on his own merits by the age of 26 to the rank of major-general. I have not searched the annals of war to recite his military history, for it is not the soldier that I have been commemorating, but I may recall a testimony not improper to be placed on record here to-day. I happened to be in company with Gen. Joseph E. Johnston about the time that Gen. Lee was first nominated for Congress. The old commander, who, as all know, was not given to effusive speech, expressed to me his hearty gratification at the event, and in doing so his high estimate of Gen. Lee as a man and of his ability as a soldier. His praise was strong and unstinted, and no one will question its sincerity. Mr. Speaker, what more need I add than to say that in all the acts and relations of life, as son and soldier, as husband and father, as private citizen and as representative of the people, as friend and as Christian, our departed colleague left a memory we may well cherish and an example we may well follow.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, great as is our country, its history is comparatively brief. Though brief, it is exceedingly instructive. So far as there can be an outcome in ever-recurring events, it is the outcome of a tremendous social and political struggle. Sir, it hardly suits the occasion to refer to the origin of this struggle or to trace its progress, but the effort for popular government is discernible through many centuries. As we come nearer to our time it becomes more intelligent and determined. Our great declaration was its best pronunciamento. Our written constitution was its most concise expression. The events that produced them founded a normal school for patriotism. In it was perfected a new departure. Fealty to lord and king was supplanted by fealty to human rights. Proclaimed in the council chamber, these rights had to be won in the field. Yorktown completed our first endeavor at nation-making. We graduated masters at Appomattox. The first proclaimed the prowess of the Confederation, the second testified to the strength of the Union. Both astonished the world. Both transpired in Virginia.

Conspicuous in this analogue of our history were the Lees of Virginia. They have a lineage too illustrious for praise. Its escutcheons are too bright for adornment. It reaches back for centuries loyal to honor and to truth. Him we mourn to-day was a gifted scion of that great name. His highest distinction was won in Confederate arms.

Thank God, I can now speak of our civil war with satisfaction and not with reluctance. I allude to it with a satisfaction akin to that one feels in gazing upon a plain fertilized by an inundation. Flowers spring up, birds sing, and golden grain nods in the sunlight. But our civil war was more like an upheaval than like a deluge. It shook every timber in the grand structure with which we had surprised the world. Other governments have fallen of their own weight; our matchless edifice could not be shattered by an explosion.

Both contestants stood guard over the popular principle and would not let it be mined. They were instructed in the same school and by the same teacher. Local privilege was as strong with the one as with the other. The dispute was whether the Union should endure the strain of the race and slavery issue. The long and vexing argument was adjourned to the battlefield. In no other respect was our system even threatened. This close connection at the root made the angry divergence begin to assimilate at the very outset.

So kindred was it, that when Grant met his heroic opponent at Appomattox, he says that he fell into such a reunion with him that he had twice to be reminded of the occasion that brought them together. He then conformed to it, and treated those who surrendered, not as conquered, but as reclaimed. Lincoln went further. He found a Confederate legislature ready-made to his hand, and promptly permitted it to repair the situation. In thus mingling the gray with the blue he was neither color-blind nor purblind. He knew what he was doing. He desired to blend them, as emblematic of a more perfect union. Possibly the Confederate legislature suited his purpose best.

After this testimonial, it looks to me something like treason to that great name to try to exclude Confederate worth from the annals of the strife or from the glory of its grand consummation. Neither act nor actor can be profitably spared.

Mr. Speaker, the other day in this very Hall I laid a chaplet on the bier of a dead comrade. To-day I am trying to commemorate the virtues of a Confederate colleague. Both died while members of this House. That both were my countrymen warms my heart. As my countrymen I can make no invidious distinction. If living neither would permit it, and he is more reckless than I who would profane the memory of either.

Mr. Speaker, I have said that I could speak of the civil war with satisfaction and not with reluctance. The occasion prompted me to say so. The occasion requires that, as a Union soldier, I should state my reasons. We learn from experience, and war is the toughest kind of experience. When it raised its horrid front and began its work of seeming devastation we shrank back from its terrible promise. The world looked to see us dismembered, but the great Republic, like a daring cruiser, emerged from the tempest sound from keel to truck. Not a brace swung loose, not a plank was sprung, no spar was shivered. Within there had to be readjustment. Aloft the Stars and Stripes rose and fell in graceful recognition of the trial. The thunder of her broadsides proclaimed the value of this object-lesson in nation-making.

We had learned a juster appreciation of ourselves as a whole people, and if this were all, it was worth the tuition. But we had besides garnered into our storehouse of knowledge vast consignments for the use of liberal, economic government. We had infused into our laws, our language, and our institutions, new vigor for conquest and for human enlightenment. Venality that dogs great efforts undoubtedly there was. But the high tide of the conflict showed no mercenary taint. On both sides it was urged from the highest motives of patriotism and of honor, and in defense of the popular principle. That principle with us means local self-government and representative union. The rebel yell was because they thought local government in peril. The Federal huzza was for representative union. Together they were cheering the same deeply embedded sentiment.

Those who would study the phenomenon must remember that where opinions approximate on parallel lines, but from some interest or sentiment refuse to coalesce, the passions are liable to ignite. Fusion then takes place in a terrible heat. The heat must be sufficient to remove the obstacle that the mass may become unified. We have as a result a firmly established representative union of local self-governments. The cooling and finishing process has left no flaw. Sir, what sort of a soldier must he be who is not proud of having been tempered in such a trial? If after the unmatched tournament this is not the spirit of victor and vanquished, then the lights of chivalry are burned out and magnanimity is no more.

Mr. Speaker. I know of no greater praise of a life than to say it was one of honest endeavor. Whatever faculties comprise it, this is the scope of human duty. When to this is added a conscience adequate to all the suggestions of a great and busy career, the sum of human excellence has been reached. All this I believe in my soul can be truthfully said of "Rooney" Lee, "Rooney" was his father's term of endearment, which all who knew him, without distinction of age, race, or sex, delighted to apply to him when absent. When present, it was always "general." A thorough soldier, there was an idyllic strain in his nature. He was essentially rural in his tastes. He loved the wheat fields and tobacco plantations of his native State. Its very air seemed to inspire him.

The Blue Ridge was to him the perfection of natural beauty. He was warm in his friendships and true to his kinships. Always dignified, there was a heartiness in his greetings that was irresistible. He was as broad as his acres. Riding or driving over his vast estate, or in its vicinity, his cheerful halloo rang in the ears of those who had not seen him, and the cheery swing of his hat, though paid to all, was a cherished compliment. If the spirit of mortal be proud, it was not his spirit. Courteous, sympathetic, unobtrusive, patriotic, knightly, and beneficent, he was a part of the soil of Virginia itself. He had the loving hospitality that would take all into the march of progress. How much of these qualities was innate, how much he drew from his high lineage, how much from the teachings of his illustrious father can never be known, but he blended them in a halo that will not soon fade from his momory.

Sir, others have spoken of the incidents of his life and of his unabated fidelity to its claims. I can not add to his record. I have met him in battle array; I have embraced him with a soldier's warmth. We entered Congress together; we have fought here side by side. It has fallen to my lot to eulogize him. This I will venture: It would mar the catalogue of bright names of which America is so proud if his was omitted from the roll.

[Mr. COWLES withholds his remarks for revision. [See Appendix.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I never had the pleasure of Gen. Lee's acquaintance, so far as I could recall, until he entered this House as a Representative of the district which lies just across the river; but there were many things in common between us which soon caused a kindliness of feeling much more warm than the frequency of our association would indicate. It happened that we were almost of the same age, born within a few weeks of each other, and that on all great questions of the day we were singularly alike in our opinions, and if I may use such an expression, even in our prejudices.

Amid all the trials of life we two found we had adhered to the simple beliefs of those Southern homes in which we were reared; that no advance in civilization, no pretense of progress, had ever obscured our views as to the olden beliefs and the simpler truths which had been inwrought into our being by the venerable fathers and beloved mothers with whom we had been blessed. The substratum of our beliefs was precisely the same. And we found that we were not ashamed of that substratum, that we were not given to apologizing for adhering to so-called "obsolete" traditions, or to creeds "that were passing out of fashion."

We also found that on the political questions of the day we were similarly in accord. We believed in the same political principles. And so it was a very rare occurrence that when the roll was called in this House we were not found voting, even on what seemed to be trivial matters, upon the same side. It was not strange that with these coincidences of belief, and with our having both served in the Confederate army, and the local accident of the nearness of our seats which threw us together, there grew up a regard greater than was indicated by our association outside of this Hall.

If I were to select in my acquaintance him who, as much as any other, deserved the title, I would say of Gen. Lee that he was a gentleman. All that had concurred in producing him was of the best. The blood which gave him life, the soil out of which he grew, the kindly influences which always surrounded him, the molding powers to which he had been subjected—all were of the noblest. A son of such houses, reared at such knees, influenced by such powers, he passed early under the influences of Harvard. Later he took his young experience as a soldier under Sidney Johnston. He began his civil life in a delicious home, with the love of an exquisite young wife. And in the Confederate service he was associated with the best and the bravest volunteers of the Old Dominion herself.

It was not strange that the product of such influences should be a gentleman. All that was courageous, all that was loyal to truth, all that was courteous to those with whom he came in contact, all that was gentle and kindly, was not only the heritage which he received with his name and his blood, but it was developed by all the environments which he was so fortunate as to have surround him. If I were to select a character of which it might be said that it was round, without angles, even without salient points, it would be his—not because he was weak, but because the calmness, the serenity, and the magnificence (if I may use a word that seems to be hyperbolic) of the equipoise of his qualities made each of them seem less important than it would have seemed if other qualities had been less.

It would not be extravagant to apply to him the paraphrase of the apostolic description of a Christian gentleman—loving without dissimulation; abhorring the evil; cleaving to the honorable; preferring to confer honor rather than to receive it; earnest in the work of life, and careful of time and opportunity to labor; hopeful of all good; patient in tribulation; forbearing to resent trespass; charitable in thought and word as in deed; given to hospitality; at peace with his own conscience and with God.

We live, Mr. Speaker, in a heroic age. I constantly hear of this being an age of materialism, of the worship of the "almighty dollar." I challenge all the past, in all the endeavors of man, to reach a higher level, to equal the heroism of the age in which we have been called to perform our part—the devotion to duty, the readiness to make sacrifices, the willingness to give all for the truth, which have marked our generation—the era in which we have to act our part.

This simple, kindly, unaffected, modest gentleman; this man, with his sweet, calm smile, who met us every day, passing in and out with a certain reticence of modesty, was himself but the type of the age in which he lived and of the people from whom he sprang. All modest as he was, he had given up everything at the call of duty. All simple and kindly as he seemed to be, he had at the head of charging squadrons captured cannon, and with more heroic endurance had lain without complaint in the cell of solitary confinement. He carried about with him in the simple modesty of his everyday life the heart that at a moment's notice was ready to still its beating at the call of duty; and with the same simplicity, with the same freedom from ostentation, with the same delicious smile, he would have walked into the jaws of death if it had become him as a gentleman to do so.

To live in such an age, to be associated with such men—and, thank God, they are not uncommon amongst us—the bar at which I practice, the tables at which I sit in the kindliness of social intercourse, the men with whom I have been blessed enough to be called into contact, the very strangers who call on business at my house, rank among them men just like unto him. I say to live in such an age, to be associated with such men, to play a part, however obscure, in such drama, make life worth the living; make the hereafter nobler for him who has been so blessed.

Mr. Speaker, to-day, in the midst of this the ending of the nineteenth century, we who will soon pass away, we who are but the remnants of a generation of war, can proudly hand over to those who shall come after us the example of lives that in war feared nothing but God, in peace strove for nothing but the good of the people. [Applause.]

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that any gentleman who desires to do so may have leave to print in the RECORD remarks on the life and character of Gen. Lee. I know that a number of gentlemen who wished to be present to-day were necessarily detained from the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COBB of Alabama). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

USE OF LINE-CARRYING PROJECTILES.

Mr. SAWYER. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2056) to repeal the provisions of an act entitled "An act to amend sections 4488 and 4489 of the Revised Statutes, requiring life-saving appliances on steamers," approved March 2, 1889, so far as they relate to steamers plying exclusively upon any of the lakes, bays, or sounds of the United States, to report it back favorably, without amendment; and I am also directed by the committee to ask for immediate action upon the bill, as it is important.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to repeal the provisions of an act entitled "An act to amend sections 4488 and 4489 of the Revised Statutes, requiring life-saving appliances on steamers," approved March 2, 1889, so far as they relate to the carrying of line-carrying projectiles and the means of propelling them on steamers plying exclusively upon any of the lakes, bays, or sounds of the United States. But nothing contained in the act shall be construed to repeal or affect the provisions so far as they apply to ocean-going steamers.

Mr. COCKRELL. When was the bill reported—this morning?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This morning.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have some explanation of it.

Mr. FRYE. The Committee on Commerce authorized the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] to ask for the immediate consideration of the bill because the season in the lakes commences about the first of March, and we have been suspending this law so far as the lakes were concerned for the last three or four years. We have not reported in favor of a general repeal of the law because the matter related to human life, and the committee desired to go very slowly indeed in relation to it.

The Secretary of the Treasury, by resolution of the Senate, last year was requested to have this matter thoroughly investigated by experts and to report to the Senate. That investigation during vacation has been made, and they report very decidedly in favor of a repeal of the law so far as vessels exclusively used in lakes, sounds, and bays are concerned. This bill simply carries out that recommendation, repealing the law so far as steamships are concerned exclusively used in lakes, bays, and sounds.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 2098) establishing a ship channel in the Columbia River, near Vancouver, Wash.; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire especially to call the attention of the Committee on Commerce to this bill. I will state that the obstruction the bill seeks to remove is just below the city of Vancouver, in the State of Washington, the most important city of the State of Washington on the Columbia River. It is 103 miles above the ocean, within that reach of the river upon which such large appropriations have been made for a number of years past.

Vancouver is an important commercial city, with a rapidly developing commerce demanding an open river. In addition to that, it is the headquarters of the military department of the Columbia.

The importance of this improvement has been called to the attention of the House of Representatives through the Secretary of War of the preceding Administration. The removal of this obstruction was earnestly pressed at that time. It has been called attention to by resolution of this body.

The commerce of Vancouver is growing at such a rate that it imperatively demands that this single obstruction between it and the ocean may be removed in order that this city may have the facilities this great river affords to general commerce. Its growing shipping trade, particularly in lumber, is being seriously obstructed by reason of the bar sought to be removed. Large contracts to the amount of millions of feet of lumber for the Chinese market must inevitably fail unless this improvement is made.

For these reasons, and others to be hereafter, presented, I wish to impress the importance of this measure upon the members of the Committee on Commerce. Unfortunately, owing to the failure of a survey and estimate by the Engineer's Department, it was not embraced in the river and harbor act of the last Congress. No more worthy improvement will be presented to this Congress.

I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 2099) to amend section 4414 of the Revised Statutes, relating to inspectors of hulls and boilers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 2100) for the relief of the estate of Emmet Crawford, deceased, late captain of the Third Regiment United States Cavalry; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas introduced a bill (S. 2101) for the relief of the children and heirs at law of Albert Pike, deceased, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 2102) granting a pension to Charles L. Hanna; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a bill (S. 2103) to increase the pension of Mrs. Ellen Key Messersmith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO AN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CASEY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the urgency deficiency appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REPRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. DIXON. I move that the bill (S. 1899) to regulate the fisheries, and for other purposes, be reprinted for the use of the Senate, as the print of the bill is exhausted.

The motion was agreed to.

ACCOUNTS WITH VIRGINIA.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I beg leave to submit the resolution which I send to the desk, and I shall ask the privilege of making a few remarks thereon.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to have restated the accounts of the State of Virginia reported in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Senate dated December 17, 1890, from the original entries of advances and payments on the books of the Treasury, and to consider such evidence of advances and payments by Virginia as may be offered by that State or the auditor thereof from the original entries on the books of the State of Virginia.

In his restatement of accounts the Secretary of the Treasury is requested to consider all bonds of the State of Virginia held on any account by the United States as offsets to any claim of Virginia, and also to cause a statement to be made showing how the account between the United States and Virginia would stand provided that the funds turned over by the United States to the Wheeling government of Virginia on account of distribution of public-land fund, and to the State of West Virginia on account of war expenditures and other funds paid to West Virginia were calculated as offsets of Virginia to the bonds of that State held by the United States; and also to make any alternative statements or explanations which he may deem necessary to the clear exposition of the status of accounts between the United States and Virginia.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the Senator ask to have the resolution referred to a committee?

Mr. DANIEL. No, I wish to have it adopted. I intend to explain the resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire that the resolution shall go over until to-morrow, but of course I have no objection to the Senator making a statement in regard to it.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to make a brief statement in support of the resolution at the time of offering it, and to ask that there may be printed in the RECORD certain papers which I possess which I think will throw light upon it.

In 1890 the Senate called upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information respecting "the amounts due to the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Virginia, and South Carolina, and the city of Baltimore, on account of advances and expenditures made by them in the war of 1812, computing the interest on said advances and expenditures," and so on. In reply to that resolution the Secretary of the Treasury states respecting Virginia what I will quote from his language:

I have no means of ascertaining the correctness of the amount stated by the Third Auditor to be due Virginia January 1, 1859 ($1,076,683.35). The papers in the claim, it appears, were in 1870 handed to Hon. J. W. Johnson, then a Senator of the United States from Virginia, for the purpose of presenting them, to the proper committee having charge of such matters, and he never returned them, but stated that they had been lost or mislaid.

At the request of the Committee on Claims, House of Representatives, the Third Auditor made in 1886 a careful computation, showing what would be the status, at that time, of the claims of Virginia for expenses in the war of 1812, by applying the principle laid down in the act of March 3, 1857. The total advances made by Virginia, as shown by reimbursements made by the United States in the various settlements, was $1,807,438.06.

The Auditor assumed that a reasonable equation of the several expenditures would fix upon July 1, 1814, as a fair approximate date from which to compute interest on the aggregate sum.

By applying the rule which governed in the Maryland case, the Auditor found, in 1886, that on July 14, 1829, there would be due Virginia—

Principal	$298,369.74
Interest	61,949.87
To which was added interest on above principal from July 14, 1829, to February 1, 1886, amounting to	1,012,318.80
To which I now add further interest on same principal from February 1, 1886, to January 1, 1891, amounting to	88,019.07
Total principal and interest January 1, 1891	1,460,657.48

Against this aggregate—

And it is to this point that I ask attention—

Against this aggregate I find offsets, as shown later in this report, amounting to $1,612,547.70, thus showing a final balance due the United States January 1, 1891, of $151,890.22.

In other words, Mr. President, the Secretary of the Treasury thus explains that some of the important papers in this case were lost in the hands of Senator John W. Johnston, who then in part represented Virginia; but if the computation were made upon the basis which he sets forth as nearly correct as he can reach, there would be, upon a settlement of accounts between the old Commonwealth of Virginia and the Government of the United States, a balance due by Virginia of $151,890.22.

In this connection I ask leave to offer and to have printed in the RECORD a communication from the auditor of public accounts of Virginia, in which he sets forth what seems to him to be an error in this computation. Unless it is objected to, I will ask that the communication may be printed in the RECORD for information, without troubling now the Senate to have it read. If it be desired, I have no objection whatsoever to having it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to printing the communication in the RECORD? The Chair hears none.

The communication referred to is as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA,
Second Auditor's Office, Richmond, January 8, 1892.

DEAR SIR: Since sending Mr. Bernard P. Green, as I wrote you I had done, on the 6th instant, the report of Mr. W. F. Taylor, late auditor of public accounts for this Commonwealth, on the amount due the State of Virginia from the United States, it occurred to me that it would be better to send you the same paper directly. This I now inclose in this letter; and I add to it a calculation of the amount due to December 31, 1891. This, as you will see, is a considerable addition to the sum brought down by Mr. Taylor. The statement of the credit we allow for the bonds bought by the Secretary of the Interior for certain Indian tribes is the one made by the Government itself.

If you will read the paragraph inclosed within the red line on page 3, you may think it worth while to send to the auditor of public accounts for a copy of the paper there referred to. This paper may take the place of the paper that they claim was lost by Hon. John W. Johnston, which statement I discredit.

Your obedient servant,

FRANK G. RUFFIN.

Hon. JOHN W. DANIEL,
United States Senate, Washington City.

[(Virginia.) Senate Document No. 19. January 15, 1878.]

Statement of the auditor of public accounts in relation to claims due the State of Virginia by the United States and by the State of Virginia to the United States.

It appears that the General Assembly of Virginia adopted a resolution, dated 17th January, 1850, appointing "Thomas Green an agent to recover from the Government of the United States all interest, arrears of interest, or other moneys due from the said Government to the Commonwealth of Virginia on account of advances made by the Commonwealth for the Government of the United States." Upon the recovery of the said claims the resolution made it the duty of the said agent to obtain payment of the same by a draft from the United States Government in favor of the auditor of public accounts of this Commonwealth.

In 1859, February 14, the then governor, Henry A. Wise, received a communication from John A. Parker, stating that a large balance seems to be due from the United States Government to the State of Virginia on account of money paid by her in the war of 1812. This communication was filed among the executive papers of that date. The governor indorsed thereon the following:

"Upon the terms proposed in the within I consent to authorize Mr. Parker to examine and report upon any claim due Virginia referred to by him. He will inquire of the First Auditor and the Attorney-General as to any question of law or fact respecting such claim; and also at Washington, and if there be any such claim he may proceed to put it into the course of prosecution as he proposes."

These gentlemen are still engaged (1878) in attending to these claims before the Congress of the United States.

In a letter to Governor Wise, dated 4th of March, 1859 (see governor's message to Legislature, 1859–'60, Document No. 1, page 316) Mr. Green states "that the entire amount of all the claims of the several States would have been a little less than $1,750,000, of which Virginia would have been entitled to about $1,100,000." He also states that this claim had passed the Senate of the United States and been rejected by the House of Representatives by a small majority.

In a report made by John A. Parker, dated February 10, 1860, he incloses the report of the Hon. Howell Cobb, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, dated 8th of January, 1859, in which the report of the Third Auditor of the United States, of the 30th of October, 1858, relative to these claims, is inclosed.

Mr. Parker sums up the amount stated by this report to be due to the State of Virginia at $1,076,683.35.

There is also on file in this department a manuscript statement of the amount due the State of Virginia, proceeding from the Third Auditor's Office of the United States, authenticated by the certificate of George S. Boutwell, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, dated 11th May, 1870.

The Third Auditor certifies that he has examined and adjusted the account of the State of Virginia, under the act of Congress passed on the 3d of March, 1825, entitled "An act authorizing the payment of interest due to the State of Virginia," and then proceeds to state the adjustment, item by item, calculating the payments made, and the interest ascertained in the manner prescribed by law, and showing a balance due to the State, on the 31st of December, 1832, of $483,758.

If the mode of calculation adopted by the Third Auditor, which seems to be the proper and just mode, be pursued, from the 31st of December, 1832, to the 31st December, 1877, there are just forty-five years, and the interest on the $483,758 will be $1,306,146.60, which, added to the amount due, makes the amount now (then) "due this State" $1,789,904.60.

The resolution of the Senate also calls for a statement of the amount claimed by the United States to be due to them by Virginia.

There is nothing in this Department to show what claims the United States now has against the State. But it appears that the Secretary of the Interior of the United States for the time being, purchased, under various acts of assembly—

Bonds of the State amounting to	$13,600.00
In like manner, under an act of the 23d of March, 1860, providing for a loan for the James River and Kanawha Canal Company, he purchased bonds, as trustee for the Cherokee national fund	90,000.00
To the Choctaw general fund, for	450,000.00
And for the Creek orphans	28,200.00
Total	581,800.00

On this amount the State is indebted for interest calculated to 1st July, 1871, to wit:

To the Secretary of the Interior	$7,208.00
To the Cherokees	47,700.00
To the Creek orphans	14,946.00
To the Choctaws	157,500.00
	227,354.00
Also interest from 1st July, 1871, to 1st of January, 1878 (six and one-years) at 6 per cent	226,902.00
	454,256.00

Then the account would stand thus:

Amount due by the United States to Virginia	1,789,904.00
Amount due by Virginia to United States	454,256.00
Leaving balance due Virginia 1st January, 1878	1,335,648.00
Or take the amount due the State on 31st December, 1832, as stated	483,758.00
With interest to date, 31st December, 1891 (fifty-nine years)	1,712,503.32
Amount of principal and interest now due	2,196,261.32

Amount of principal due United States by Virginia on 1st January, 1878 $581,800
Interest to 1st July, 1871 227,354
Interest to 1st January, 1878 226,902
Interest to 1st January, 1892 488,712

Making amount of principal and interest now due	1,524,768.00
Leaving balance due Virginia, 1st January, 1892	671,493.32

Mr. DANIEL. I will also request to have printed a document which I hold in my hand entitled "The claim of Virginia vs. The United States, as stated by Peter Hagner, Third Auditor, in 1825; by Richard Cutts, Second Comptroller, in 1825, and by A. M. Gangewer, Third Auditor, April 12, 1870, in a letter to Senator John W. Johnston. Copy certified by William F. Taylor, auditor of public accounts of Virginia, on February 25, 1878." I ask that this document may be also associated with the resolution and that it be printed in the RECORD for the reason that it is believed by many that this is one of the papers which were lost or misplaced in some way during the time when Senator Johnston was representing this claim here, and because, furthermore, it seems to be impracticable to get another copy of this document, and any committee which might consider this matter would be unlikely to have the information which it contains before them.

The paper referred to is as follows:

The claim of Virginia vs. The United States, as stated by Peter Hagner, Third Auditor, in 1825; by Richard Cutts, Second Comptroller, in 1825; and by A. M. Gangewer, Third Auditor, April 12, 1870, in a letter to Senator J. W. Johnston. Copy certified by William F. Taylor, auditor of public accounts of Virginia, on February 25, 1878.

Be it remembered, that A. M. Gangewer, esq., who certified the annexed transcripts, is now, and was at the time of doing so, Acting Third Auditor of the Treasury; and that full faith and credit are due to his official attestations.

In testimony whereof, I, George S. Boutwell, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, have hereunto subscribed my name and caused to be affixed the seal of this Department, at the city of Washington, this 11th day of May, in the year of our Lord 1870.

GEORGE S. BOUTWELL.
Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Third Auditor's Office, May 10, 1870.

I, A. M. Gangewer, Acting Third Auditor of the Treasury of the United States, hereby certify that the annexed are true copies of papers on file in this office with the claim of the State of Virginia.

And that the State is entitled pursuant to said act and to the opinion of the Attorney-General thereon, for interest on loans or moneys borrowed and actually expended by Virginia for the use and benefit of the United States, during the late war with Great Britain, to a credit for $178,480.11.

Leaving due to Virginia from the United States this sum, $128,480.11.

Send to Jerman Baker, treasurer of the State of Virginia.
As appears from the statement and vouchers herewith transmitted for the decision of the Second Comptroller of the Treasury thereon.

RICHMOND, VA., OFFICE OF THE AUDITOR OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS,
February 25, 1878.

I certify the foregoing to be a correct copy of an account filed in this office, showing a balance due from the Government of the United States to the State of Virginia as of the 31st December, 1832, of $483,758.

WM. F. TAYLOR.
Auditor Public Accounts.

[Indorsed.]

Copy of a paper on file in the room of the Committee on Military Affairs House of Representatives, in the matter of H. R. 940, Forty-fifth Congress, first session.

CHARLES W. DIETRICH,
Clerk of Committee.

APRIL 30, 1878.

Mr. DANIEL. Furthermore, Mr. President, I beg leave to say in respect to this resolution that I have been in a measure prompted to offer it by the fact that the State of West Virginia is now asking that the sum of about $150,000 claimed to be due to her treasury on account of direct tax, not paid by the people but out of the treasury, should be reimbursed and paid to her. I call attention to the fact that this amount now in the Treasury and which is claimed by the State of West Virginia as a fund which should be paid directly to her is about equal to the amount which the State of West Virginia by this letter of the Secretary of the Treasury is claimed to owe the United States.

The debt due to the United States by the State of Virginia is evidenced by certain bonds, mainly investments on behalf of the Indian trust fund at the time when this money was loaned to the State of Virginia by the Government of the United States. A favorable report had already been made in respect to the Virginia claim as long ago as 1859, and it was then anticipated that it would pass in consonance with the precedents which had been established, and that the one would in all probability offset and counterbalance the other.

In respect to the State of West Virginia I will not now anticipate further than to suggest the considerations which make proper in my judgment the inquiry as to how the accounts stand, if balances from the Treasury which have been paid to the State of West Virginia had been retained as an offset to the claim against the old Commonwealth.

In brief, Mr. President, although I do not seek by this inquiry to intimate any opinion on the part of the Senate or to prejudge a question to which it leads but does not undertake to decide, I base its pertinency upon the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States that both Virginia and West Virginia are bound to the Government on the bonds which were given by that Commonwealth when it was one and entire. I shall not argue that question now or seek to go into the differentiations and shades of opinion which may exist concerning it. I merely state it that it may be seen that the inquiry is a proper one for enlightenment in order that the whole matter may be before the Senate when it shall come to pass ultimately upon it.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Virginia if he has any objection to incorporating in his resolution the inquiry as to the State of South Carolina? I should like to have that included.

Mr. DANIEL. None whatever. I beg leave to state that in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, which I have now before me, I think the Senator will find that all the information which he seeks is amply supplied. It was furnished to the Senate in response to a resolution which I had the honor to offer in a previous Congress. The difficulty as to the amounts due Virginia—I do not believe there is any question as to the other States—arises from some loss of papers or difference of opinion as to the details of her account.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire if the letter is printed?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir; I had it here before me.

Mr. BUTLER. I can get it, then.

Mr. DANIEL. The letter has been handed to the Secretary, and I think the Senator will find that all the information he desires is there.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, with reference to the resolution of the Senator from Virginia, I wish simply to ask that it may go over until to-morrow, so that I may have an opportunity to read it more carefully. I did not hear the resolution read from the desk, but so far as I have been able to catch the contents of it I do not know of any objection which I shall intervene to prevent its passage by the Senate.

I will say, though, in relation to the joint resolution which was introduced in the Senate with reference to the payment back by the Government of the United States to the State of West Virginia of the amount paid by it on the direct tax of 1861, that I do not see that the pending resolution will affect in any way the consideration of that joint resolution, which will soon again come before the Senate. I do not concur with the Senator from Virginia in the view which he has taken that it can have any bearing upon that joint resolution.

I desire further to dissent from another conclusion which the Senator has announced, that the Attorney-General by any opinion that he has issued, so far as I have any knowledge, has ever held as a legal proposition that the two States were equally bound for the debt existing prior to the separation and division of those States and the creation of the State of West Virginia; but I understand the Attorney-General has decided that whatever is an equitable proportion of that debt due by the State of West Virginia, if any, to the State of Virginia, is a matter that may be settled. That is, as far as I understand, the decision of the Attorney-General.

I suggest, however, that we should not go into the discussion of that joint resolution at this time, and I limit my remarks here to simply correcting what I conceive to be a misapprehension of the facts as stated by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I objected to the passage of the resolution before knowing whether the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] desired to have it passed at this time, because I noticed it was not a simple call upon the Secretary of the Treasury for information within his possession, but that it undertook to instruct the Secretary to make up certain accounts in a particular manner. For that reason I thought the resolution ought either to go over or to be referred to a committee of the Senate, and, if it is agreeable to the Senator, I will submit such a motion.

Mr. DANIEL. I have no objection to the resolution going over.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUTLER. I trust the Senator from New Hampshire will not make that motion just at this time. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] has requested that the resolution go over until to-morrow.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will enter the motion to refer, and let it go over with the resolution, if there be no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. I trust the resolution will not be referred to a committee to-day, as I am very anxious to see the RECORD containing the documents which have been presented by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

Mr. CHANDLER. I make the motion to refer, and ask that it may go over with the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to refer will be entered, and the resolution will lie over until to-morrow.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 4th instant approved and signed the act (S. 1762) for the relief of the University of the State of Missouri.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representative, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, returned to the Senate in compliance with its request the joint resolution (S. R. 9) to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the governor of the State of West Virginia the sum appropriated by the act of Congress entitled "An act to credit and pay to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia all moneys collected under the direct tax levied by act of Congress, approved August 5, 1861."

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 3888) for the relief of Samuel Howard; and

A bill (H. R. 5399) making appropriations to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the expenses of the Eleventh Census, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed resolutions commemorative of the life and services of Hon. William Henry Fitzhugh Lee, late a Representative from the State of Virginia.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 217) to amend an act entitled "An act for the construction of a railroad and wagon bridge across the Mississippi River at South St. Paul, Minn.," approved April 26, 1890; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. STEWART. I dislike to rise to a question of privilege, but a series of newspaper criticisms on my conduct in relation to the contested-election case from the State of Idaho so misrepresent me, that I think, in justice to the contestant, I ought to present them, have them read, and make such statement as I think proper with regard to them. They are contained in four slips. No. 1 appears in the Idaho Daily Statesman of January 29; No. 2 in the issue of the same paper of February 2; No. 3 in the Star of this city of February 4, and No. 4 in the New York Sun of February 5. I ask the Secretary to read these slips in their order. They are all numbered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The papers will be read if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

(1)

STEWART'S PURPOSE—HE DESIRES TO REVENGE HIMSELF ON SENATOR DUBOIS FOR THE LATTER'S PART IN DEFEATING HIS SCHEME TO DISRUPT IDAHO.

* * * * * * *

Senator STEWART continues his campaign in Clagett's favor. To-day he is begging for a few Republican votes for his protégé, basing his appeal on Clagett's alleged past services to the party, etc. He does not hope to seat Clagett, but pleads that a few votes may be cast for him in order to give his case standing. Senators, however, understand what the animus of STEWART'S attitude is. They know that the Nevada Senator has never forgiven DUBOIS for thwarting his attempts to dismember Idaho and annex the southern portion of its territory to his State. They know that Clagett actively cooperated with him in that effort to disrupt and destroy Idaho, and they are alive to the fact that STEWART is now actuated by a desire to "get even" with the man who defeated his scheme of destruction, by ousting him from his seat and giving the place to the man who assisted in that nefarious attempt.

The subcommittee of the Senate Elections Committee, consisting of Senators MITCHELL, HOAR, and PUGH, have agreed upon the report that will be made to the full committee for presentation to the Senate in favor of DUBOIS. It is full, convincing, and exhaustive.

The two Democratic members of the committee who voted against DUBOIS, GRAY and VANCE, may make a minority report, but it is not thought that they will do so.

(2.)

CLAGETT'S CONTEST—HE SEEMS TO HAVE MOVED OVER BODILY TO THE DEMOCRATS—CLOAKROOM TALK—STEWART IS ROASTED BY REPUBLICAN MEMBERS.

[Special to the Statesman.]

WASHINGTON, February 1.

STEWART and Clagett have evidently concluded that the Republican Senators are hopelessly against them in their effort to unseat Senator DUBOIS. The Republican members have become aroused over Senator STEWART'S action, and they are very indignant at him. Several of them have told him in very plain terms what they think of his conduct.

Since Pride left, the overtures to the Democrats had not been so bold until to-day, when Clagett seemed to get back to the ground occupied while his Boisé lieutenant was here. After an earnest talk with Democrats in the Senate Chamber for Democratic support, some Senators retired with him to the Democratic cloakroom, where over an hour was spent in consultation.

Clagett has generally sat on the Republican side of the Chamber, but, as he relies entirely on Democratic support, his action to-day leads to the inference that he has already moved over into the other camp, bag and baggage.

He also had a private interview with Senators GRAY and VANCE, and it is understood that they have agreed to make a minority report in his favor.

It is fair to remember that Senators PUGH and TURPIE, the other two Democratic members of the Elections Committee, signed the majority report in favor of DUBOIS with the five Republicans. It will be impossible, it is thought, to get a majority of the Democratic Senators to indorse any tricky scheme, as they will be governed by the law and precedents.

STEWART AND CLAGETT—WHY THE NEVADA SENATOR WANTS TO SEAT A DEMOCRAT.

More than a few Republicans have been endeavoring for some time past to find out why Senator STEWART, who is a Republican, should be so earnest in his endeavor to seat Contestant Clagett, who is a Democrat. Some of Senator DUBOIS's friends have been investigating a little, and now it is rumored they have discovered the true cause of STEWART'S activity. During the lifetime of the Fiftieth Congress Senator STEWART, they say, tried his best to wipe Idaho off the map of the United States. He proposed to divide the then Territory, and wanted the lower half to be tacked onto Nevada; the upper half was to become a part of the State of Washington. Mr. DUBOIS, who was at that time Idaho's Delegate in the House, fought the scheme with that vigor which is one of his most marked characteristics. Senator STEWART, too, was persistent. He realized that Nevada was retrograding with disheartening rapidity, and it was as evident to him as it was to everyone else that new territory and new blood were necessary to Nevada's existence. Delegate DUBOIS came out ahead. Idaho was ultimately admitted as a State and Delegate DUBOIS was promoted to Senatorial honors. The contestant in the pending case—Mr. Clagett—was, they say, one of the Idahoians who supported Senator STEWART in his effort to remove Idaho and increase Nevada. The contest, they intimate, affords Senator STEWART an opportunity to scratch the back of him who four years ago scratched his, STEWART'S, back, or words to that effect.

Senator STEWART of Nevada is and has been for several weeks throwing every possible obstacle in the way of a settlement of the contested seat of Senator DUBOIS of Idaho. Mr. STEWART is about the only Republican Senator who is in favor of the claim of Mr. Clagett, the contestant, and there is no possibility that Mr. DUBOIS can be disturbed in his seat. The Committee on Privileges and Elections were unanimously in favor of his undisputed title to the seat, and every Republican Senator except Mr. STEWART will doubtless vote for him. The Nevada Senator, however, still keeps up the fight, and until to-day no explanation of his peculiar course has been forthcoming. It is now learned what the trouble is. It appears that during the Fiftieth Congress Senator STEWART was much opposed to the admission of Idaho into the Union. He wanted to see the Territory divided, the lower half to be attached to Nevada and the upper half to become a part of the State of Washington. The Senator realized that Nevada was rapidly being depopulated and that new blood and new territory were needed to its continued existence. Senator DUBOIS, then a Delegate, made a strong fight for Idaho, and won. Mr. Claggett, who now wants the seat of Mr. DUBOIS, was, it is said, in favor of Mr. STEWART'S plan to split Idaho in twain, and gave his best efforts to the movement. Senator STEWART is now inclined to assist the man who then assisted him. Mr. DUBOIS, notwithstanding, will retain his seat in the Senate without serious opposition.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I should not have called the attention of the Senate to these criticisms solely on my own account, but they are so unjust to Mr. Clagett, representing throughout that he is a Democrat, that I thought I ought, having known him so long, to make some allusion to them.

Mr. Clagett, to my personal knowledge, has been a consistent Republican for more than thirty years. Furthermore, it is not true that Mr. Clagett coöperated with me in any effort to dismember Idaho; on the contrary, he lived in the northern part of Idaho, in the mining section, and he was opposed to the annexation of what is known as Northern Idaho to Washington in case it included the mining region. He drew a petition, which was numerously signed by miners there, and sent it here, praying that in case there was any division of Idaho the mining section of the Territory might be annexed to Montana; and in that way he divided the sentiment in Northern Idaho. He did not wish it annexed to Washington, because he said that Washington was purely an agricultural State, and it would be prejudicial to the mining interests. His efforts in that connection did a great deal to prevent the consummation of what was originally proposed.

Some years ago the Legislature of Idaho, both political parties concurring, passed a resolution for the division of the Territory, and providing that the northern part be attached to Washington. That division suggested to me the idea that in that case it would be a good thing to annex Southern Idaho to Nevada.

I am aware that Nevada has a small population and that it will be a long time before it gets a large population, but that it ultimately will become a large State there can be no doubt at all. It has sufficient resources, agricultural and otherwise, when developed, to make it a good State, but the agricultural portion is in isolated valleys, a long way from market, and the people have not occupied as yet those remote portions, except to supply the local market for mining. But Nevada is not a hopeless case, and no one need have any apprehension but what Nevada will come out all right.

At that time I thought there was a sentiment in the East that we should not make so many small States, and I then had no idea that the East would consent to the admission of Idaho with its then population and resources. I was not then as familiar with its resources as I have become since, but when I found that there was a disposition on the part of the larger States to admit Idaho I at once fell into the plan and advocated it in the committee and here in the Senate and elsewhere, and did all I could to promote the passage of the bill to admit Idaho.

Mr. DUBOIS was opposed to the division of Idaho, very properly. I never objected to his position and it never changed our personal relations. I had nothing against him on that account, nothing in the world. So upon that question there was no feeling whatever. I should hate to have the idea go out that I am influenced in deciding a question of law on account of personal feeling between these gentlemen. I have no such feeling whatever and never have had. I have known these gentlemen for many years, but I have known Mr. Clagett longer than Mr. DUBOIS. They are both Republicans, and the question before the Senate, as I have said, is purely a question of law and the character of these men can not enter into the discussion to bias any man.

I simply say this in all fairness, and I should not have said it if all Senators here had known Mr. Clagett as I do. I should have thought it unnecessary to say anything in his behalf anywhere in the region where he has ever lived. I have said this much because I thought it but just and right to remove any idea that may obtain among any class of people that I would be influenced in my decision of a question of law by personal feeling.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 3888) for the relief of Samuel Howard was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. 5399) making appropriations to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the expenses of the Eleventh Census, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further morning business, the Calender, under Rule VIII, is in order.

Mr. HISCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and twenty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished businsss.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1549) providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reading of the bill will be resumed.

The Chief Clerk read section 75.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest that we were considering section 74, and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] desired to be heard on that section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that there is no amendment pending to section 74.

Mr. COCKRELL. That section was under discussion at the time when we last considered the bill. I stated then that I certainly very seriously objected to the provision of that section that—

All documents in excess of 25 copies of any one publication remaining in the folding room of the Senate or House at the expiration of two years, after being placed to the credit of a Senator or Representative or Delegate, shall be turned over to the superintendent of documents for distribution by him to public libraries or depositories or for sale, as in his judgment shall best subserve the public interest.

I think that is very unjust; but as we were acting upon the amendments of the committee I simply gave notice that at the proper time I should call attention to it, in order that we might go on with the committee amendments.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am very glad to have that course taken; but before passing from section 74 I desire to call the attention of the Senate, particularly the attention of the Senator from Missouri, to what will be the result if the section is adopted.

If 25 copies of any one document are allowed to remain indefinitely as to time to the quota of any member of Congress, then this section will only apply to such documents as are furnished in very large amounts. Multiplying 25, the number of copies proposed to be retained, by 90, the number of the Senate including the Vice-President and the Secretary of the Senate, and it makes 2,250 copies. Multiplying 25 by 360, the number of members of the House of Representatives under the last apportionment, and it will be 9,000 copies. There are very few documents that are published in excess of 11,250 for distribution by the two Houses of Congress.

Now, if the Senator will examine this report he will find, and I think the showing will surprise him, that by the statement of the superintendent of the House folding room, to be found on page 214 of the report, at the time of the last invoice, which was the 2d of December, 1889, and mark it, that was the beginning of a Congress when the long vacation had elapsed and the opportunity had been given to distribute documents, there was the large sum of 900,000 volumes, weighing in the neighborhood of 1,500 tons, as Mr. Palmer states on page 219, under the control of the superintendent of the House folding room. The fact appears, and it is notorious, that in both Houses of Congress there is an enormous accumulation of documents until they become stale and worthless, because members of Congress do not see fit to exercise their privilege of distribution.

This proposition is simply that in excess of 25 to each member of either House, if he sees fit to permit documents to accumulate beyond that amount in the folding room, they shall be turned over to the superintendent of documents for distribution to the libraries, etc., of the country. It seems to me this provision will commend itself to the Senator from Missouri as he shall further consider it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not disposed to punish Senators who attend to the distribution of their documents and desire to retain certain documents for the purpose of keeping sets to be furnished to new libraries and institutions of learning as they are established, and they are being established very rapidly in the Western States. I have been able, by keeping some of mine over, to supply a number of libraries that are very important now, which have sprung into existence since the commencement of the publication of that series of documents. I do not think that the faithful Senator should be punished because some Senators will not distribute their documents.

I understand that in the other House they have a large number of documents which have accumulated, as shown on the pages to which the Senator referred. There is no trouble about that. We can arrange about a member distributing at the close of his term, and they generally do there distribute at the close of their terms, as Mr. Palmer indicates. However, we can bring this matter up when we get through with the amendments of the committee.

Mr. MANDERSON. All right.

Mr. COCKRELL. There should certainly not be a punishment inflicted upon Senators who reserve their documents and distribute them to libraries and new institutions, simply because some Senators do not distribute their documents. As a distinguished Senator once said, in a very playful way, he did not have much trouble with his documents; his constituents who could read them did not call upon him for them, and those who were his friends could not read, and therefore he had no trouble about them. [Laughter.]

Section 76 was read, as follows:

SEC. 76. Any Senator, Representative, or Delegate having public documents to his credit at the expiration of his term of office shall take the same within nine months after his term has expired, and if he shall not do so within such period he shall forfeit them to his successor in office.

Mr. COCKRELL. I thought that was the law now, Mr. President.

Mr. MANDERSON. No.

Mr. COCKRELL. I thought we had a rule that Senators were allowed until the beginning of the next session after the expiration of their term.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is only as to the right to frank documents. I do not think it reaches to the extent that if a Senator or a Member does not take his public documents, he shall forfeit them to his successor in office, but simply that he has a right to frank documents for nine months after his term expires.

The first clause of section 77 was read, as follows:

SEC. 77. Extra copies of documents and reports shall be printed promptly when the same shall be ready for publication, and shall be bound in paper or cloth, as directed by the Joint Committee on Printing, and shall be of the number following in addition to the usual number.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, before passing to the consideration of this section, the purport or extent of which is to fix the number for distribution by Congress and by the Departments under the order of Congress, I wish to say that in almost every instance as to the general and current publications that come periodically, the effort of the committee has been to ascertain whether the number now published or which has been published under concurrent resolution has been greater than was needed. If Senators will turn to the concurrent resolution of Congress under which the committee acted, they will find that the main feature of that resolution was that there should be an effort to economize the public printing.

Now, as we run along through this bill by sections it will be found by reference to the sectional annotations in the report that we have materially reduced many of these publications. It may be that we have gone further than Senators think we should have gone with reference to this matter, but we have made a thorough investigation. Take, for instance, the very first item in this section, that of the Agricultural Report. The number of that report usually printed under concurrent resolution of Congress of late years has been 400,000 volumes. Our investigation showed the fact that within a very short period of time after this work issued from the press, while the cost is from 40 to 50 cents per volume, it could be bought by the hundred and thousand copies at from 5 to 10 cents a volume. It seemed to us that that fact showed that that particular publication was published in excess of the demand.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. COKE. The reason for the fact that he states I imagine is that a large number of those reports are issued to gentlemen residing in cities who have no use for them at all. They certainly are not disposed of in that way by Representatives and Senators who represent agricultural districts and agricultural people.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think not.

Mr. COKE. So far as that particular reduction is concerned, whenever it is in order I shall propose an amendment to restore it at least to the original number.

It will be observed that there has been an addition of twelve new Senators to this body. That reduces the proportion of reports issued to each Senator. Now, when you make an additional reduction of one-fourth of the entire number, you bring it down to a very small dividend for each one of the Senators, and the same way with the Representatives, I imagine.

The Agricultural Report is the most attractive, the most instructive, and the most popular report issued from any of the Departments of this Government. The farming people of the United States especially desire those reports. There is a great demand for them. None of us ever are able to supply the demand with the number of copies that we get now. To reduce it below its present number is, in my judgment, false economy. The people ought to have these reports, and they would buy them if they knew where they could get them.

The farmers constitute nearly one-half of the voting population of this country, and this report is the only one that is issued for their benefit. The number should not be reduced, but, on the contrary, in my judgment 500,000 copies should be printed.

I will propose an amendment to this clause of the section whenever the committee's amendments are disposed of, and also to the next clause relative to the report of the Bureau of Animal Industry. There were 50,000 copies of those printed heretofore. They have been reduced down to 40,000. I shall ask that the original number of that report be also restored.

Mr. MANDERSON. I should be very glad to have the Senator take the sense of the Senate upon those propositions after the committee amendments shall be disposed of.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading, and read the second clause of section 77, as follows:

Of the Agricultural Report, 300,000 copies, of which 50,000 shall be for the Senate, 225,000 for the House, and 25,000 for distribution by the Agricultural Department.

Mr. BUTLER. May I inquire for information of the Senator from Nebraska, because I really am not informed about it, are these documents distributed equally among Senators?

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly they are.

Mr. BUTLER. Each Senator gets as many as any other Senator?

Mr. MANDERSON. As many as any other Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. Without any regard to the geographical area, the population, or the character of the constituency that he represents?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, that has been the practice, and yet I see, as undoubtedly the Senator has seen, that frequently that works somewhat unfairly. For instance, I realize that a member representing an agricultural constituency would have great demand for the agricultural report, take that as one instance, and that those who live in cities and represent a municipal constituency would have little or no need for that report; but the difficulty is to make any different division of documents except that which now obtains. We have sought to do so in certain instances, and when we come to that section of this bill which has reference to the distribution of eulogies upon deceased members of Congress, there is a new method of distribution proposed.

This bill, I might say, encourages by its terms a system of exchange of documents among members. That has obtained in practice in both Houses of Congress, and I think it frequently occurs that a member from a city will exchange his agricultural reports with some member from an agricultural district, receiving in lieu thereof the work on commerce and navigation or something else that is desirable to his constituents. This bill encourages that idea.

Mr. BUTLER. I was going to inquire of the Senator whether the committee had had the matter under consideration as to a change in the form of the distribution of these documents?

Mr. MANDERSON. We did have it under consideration, but when we attempted to reach legislation which would accomplish the purpose that the Senator has in view, we found it almost impossible to reach any other method of distribution.

Mr. BUTLER. I did not know how practicable it was, and yet it occurred to me, while this debate was going on and in view of what has fallen from the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE], that possibly some system might be adopted which would obviate some of the difficulties to which he called attention.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think we reach the result by the inauguration of this distribution bureau, as it may be termed, which is under the control of Congress, and that as a part of the duties of the superintendent of documents he can make this exchange. That is very easily accomplished. It is a matter of detail, the work of the superintendent of documents. I have no question but that as the result of the establishment of that bureau, taking it out of the Interior Department and placing it here, there will come, as the favorite method of exchange, that it shall be done through this superintendent.

Mr. BUTLER. Of course there are a great many of the States where there is small territory with very many large towns and cities, where the Agricultural Reports, as the Senator from Texas has said, would be of no earthly value. There are very many other States with large agricultural communities, as is the case in my own State, where there would be great demand for them, and they would be very valuable. We should get a larger number of them. Hence it was that I made the inqury that I made, in the hope that it might result in something of that kind. I do not know exactly how it can be accomplished.

Mr. PADDOCK. I have just come into the Chamber, and I should like to inquire of my colleague if the proposition to reduce the number of Agricultural Reports has been voted upon?

Mr. MANDERSON. It has not been. The bill is subject to amendment.

The reading of section 77 was resumed with the clause beginning in line 11, as follows:

Of the report of the Bureau of Animal Industry, 40,000 copies, of which 10,000 shall be for the Senate, 20,000 for the House, and 10,000 for distribution by the Agricultural Department.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if any attention has been paid, in fixing these numbers for each respective document, to the number of members of the Senate and the persons who receive them in the Senate and in the House of Representatives, so that there will be no surplus. I should like to know how many persons receive documents in the Senate. Each Senator, there being 88 Senators, now receive them. Who else is entitled to each one of the documents issued?

Mr. MANDERSON. The Vice-President of the United States and the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. That makes 90 persons. Who is entitled to them in the House of Representatives?

Mr. MANDERSON. Each member of the House and the Clerk of the House, and my impression is the Doorkeeper of the House also, but of that I am not absolutely certain.

Mr. COCKRELL. It seems to me that if a close calculation were made, all this overflow or surplus of 25 or 50 or 75 documents of this one and that one and the other kind could be avoided, and there would be no trouble; but if it has heretofore existed, it must have been because we did not print such a number as would enable the whole amount to be consumed by those entitled to them in an equal distribution. You print 300 copies of one document and there are 90 persons in the Senate entitled to receive copies. That is 270 copies, allowing 3 to each, and there are 30 copies over, which are stored away in the document room here. We order another print of 400 copies, we have 90 persons entitled to them, and we give each 4 copies. There are 360 copies, and there are 40 copies in excess. It seems to me that all that wastage can be avoided by fixing an exact number, so that there will be only 1 or 2 extra copies, if necessary; and I should like to know whether in the amount fixed here that kind of distribution has been kept in view?

Mr. MANDERSON. That consideration has received very great care at the hands of the committee. In the exploration that has been made I think I can safely say that there is no proposition which can be suggested as we proceed through this bill that has not challenged the attention either of a member of the committee or some witness before the committee; and this particular matter received consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then, will the Senator explain this provision:

Of the Astronomical and Meteorological Observations of the Naval Observatory, 1,800 copies; 300 for the Senate, 700 for the House.

Three hundred for the Senate. Three times 9 are 27. That leaves 30 surplus there. Then of the very next report mentioned 200 copies are to be printed for the Senate. Twice 90 is 180. There is a surplus of 20 there. It seems to me there is a pretty large surplus in every one of these documents, as far as I have taken the time to divide them.

Mr. MANDERSON. If the Senator will rest his soul in patience I will try to explain what the action of the committee was. It was not considered desirable to multiply the number to be printed for the Senate by 90, and in every instance publish that number. We make an even distribution among Senators, because we were told by the superintendents of the folding rooms that it frequently happened that owing to defective printing, defective binding where the different signatures were gathered in that hurry which characterizes this sort of work, sometimes to cover deficiencies where the folding room had perhaps made a miscount, it was well to have some surplus numbers; that frequently a Senator found himself stripped of all documents of a certain character, and that after a year or two had elapsed he wanted an additional copy for some constituent to fill a set. This supernumerary or extra number that is left as a remainder after the division of a round number among the members of Congress has been used for that purpose.

The great demand upon Congress has been, and it has been evidenced by repeated petitions from the librarians of the country, that libraries which are not now designated depositories should receive the best or the cream of Government publications. The best are those that are printed in excess of the usual number, in extra numbers for distribution by Congress. So the committee concluded that it would leave this round number. That in some instances will leave a surplus of 30, sometimes of 40, more or less. The committee concluded that it would leave this round number as it has been heretofore, and leave 25 copies of this remainder in the folding room of each House to supply any excess of the character that I have mentioned, where a Senator or Member had exhausted his supply and desired another number out of the general quota. We provided that all of the remainder in excess of 25 to each House should be turned over to the superintendent of documents. That provision will be found at the foot of page 29:

Where, in the division among Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of extra copies of documents printed for the use of Congress, there shall be a remainder beyond the number of 25 to each House of Congress the surplus beyond 25 shall be turned over by the superintendents of the folding rooms to the superintendent of documents for distribution and sale by him under the provisions of this law.

Then it goes on to provide by the amendment that of the surplus numbers from the accumulation in the Departments and in Congress turned over to him the distribution shall be as follows:

First, to public and school libraries for the purpose of completing broken sets; second, to public and school libraries that have not been supplied with any portion of such sets; third, to other parties, which persons and libraries shall be named to him by Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress; and in this distribution the superintendent of documents shall see that as far as possible an equal allowance is made to each member of Congress.

So there is in the hands of the superintendent, of this remainder over, a fund or accumulation from which he can supply the school and public libraries that are not designated depositories. I think it will be ascertained that that is a far better method than to multiply by the number in each House, 90 in the Senate and 362 perhaps, as it will be in the House of Representatives at the next Congress, and make that the exact and unvarying number.

Mr. COCKRELL. What will be the number in the present House?

Mr. MANDERSON. The number in the other House under the new apportionment will be 360. I think perhaps 362 will be the number in the next Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. That depends upon what other officers besides members get the documents.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have said that my impression is that in the other House the Clerk of the House and the Doorkeeper of the House are also entitled to documents, but as to that I am not very positive.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reading of the bill will be continued.

The Chief Clerk read the next paragraph of section 77, as follows:

Of the Astronomical and Meteorological Observations of the Naval Observatory, 1,800 copies: 300 for the Senate, 700 for the House, and 800 for distribution by the Navy Department.

Mr. MANDERSON. On page 33, section 77, line 22, I move to strike out the words "Astronomical and Meteorological;" so as to read:

Of the Observations of the Naval Observatory, 1,800 copies.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. In line 25 of the same paragraph, I move to strike out the words "Navy Department" and to insert the words "Naval Observatory;" so as to read:

Eight hundred for distribution by the Naval Observatory.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. I move to add at the end of the paragraph:

And of the Astronomical Appendices to the above Observations, 1,200 separate copies, and of the Meteorological and Magnetic Observations, 1,000 separate copies, for distribution by the Naval Observatory.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. These amendments are made to the section by reason of a communication received from the Superintendent of the Naval Observatory. This reaches a very much better condition, I think, than the section as reported by the committee. I ask that the letters be printed in the RECORD, as showing the abundant reason for this change.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letters will be printed in the RECORD if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The letters are as follows:

UNITED STATES NAVAL OBSERVATORY,
Washington, December 5, 1890.

SIR: I have the honor to submit to your attention the inclosed draft of a proposed concurrent resolution whose substance I would respectfully recommend be embodied in legislation, for the following reasons:

The printing of the complete annual volumes of observations for the years 1886, 1887, and 1888, which will contain the appendices referred to in the proposed resolution, was authorized by a concurrent resolution of the Senate of the second session of the Fiftieth Congress, which resolution passed the House of Representatives January 8, 1889. It would seem fitting that the separate copies of the appendices to the same volumes should be printed under the same auspices.

The distribution by the Naval Observatory of the 800 copies of the complete annual volume of observations is mostly confined to public and college libraries and to exchanges with other observatories and scientific institutions, while the separate copies of the appendices (which contain the condensed results of observations and investigations, and which are issued a considerable time in advance of their complete volumes) are distributed mostly to individuals—astronomers, mathematicians, and physicists—to whom it is of importance that they receive these published results as promptly as possible.

With the rapid progress of astronomy and its allied branches of science, the number of able workers in these fields increases in a corresponding degree, and the exchange list of those who receive these appendices from the Observatory has grown so rapidly in the last few years that the number of the copies needed makes too great a demand upon the printing fund of the Navy Department, which has heretofore borne the expense, and the progress of the printing has been much delayed in consequence. The passage of the inclosed resolution will allow this important work to proceed without interruption as the material is made ready for the printer.

The estimated approximate cost of the 1,200 copies of the appendices to these three annual volumes (as nearly as it can be estimated from the volumes already published) will be about $4,000.

I trust that this matter may receive your early and favorable consideration.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

F. V. MCNAIR,
Captain U. S. Navy, Superintendent Naval Observatory.

The CHAIRMAN of the Senate Committee on Printing and Binding.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Bureau of Equipment, December 5, 1890.

Approved and forwarded.

GEO. DEWEY, Chief of Bureau.

UNITED STATES NAVAL OBSERVATORY,
Washington, January 20, 1892.

SIR: Referring to my letter of November 18, 1891, inclosing a draft of a proposed resolution for printing the observations of the Naval Observatory for the years 1889–'92, with separate copies of the Astronomical Appendices and of the Meteorological and Magnetic Observations for the use of the Observatory, which was forwarded to you by the Navy Department too late, I understand, to be incorporated in the bill (S. 1549 or H. R. 3513) recently reported to each House of Congress, and noting the fact that this bill is now intended to provide for the permanent publications of the current annual volumes of the observations of this Observatory, I take the liberty of addressing you directly (as the bill is already under consideration in the House of Representatives) and to suggest that the following amendments to the bill will make it conform to the substance of the proposed resolution in my former letter, and would respectfully request that the present bill be amended accordingly:

Page 33, section 77, at end of line 25, add, "and of the Astronomical Appendices to the above observations 1,200 separate copies, and of the Meteorological and Magnetic Observations 1,000 separate copies, for distribution by the Naval Obervatory."

In explanation of the last amendment my reasons for requesting the printing of 1,200 separate copies of the Astronomical Appendices have been briefly summarized in my letter of a year ago (1890, December 5), which was embodied in your report on a resolution to print these same appendices for previous years, and of which I have the honor to inclose a printed copy. I may add that it is a measure of economy to print these separate copies of the appendices to the larger and more expensive volumes, since the smaller and cheaper appendices contain results of the Observatory work more interesting to the general public and satisfy a large personal exchange list of astronomers, mathematicians, and physicists, who would otherwise need to be supplied with the large volumes in order to receive the information which they ought to expect. As to the Meteorological and Magnetic Observations, these are also supplied to a list of meteorological and magnetic observatories and observers, most of whom do not receive the whole volume of observations, but who should be entitled to it if these particular observations were not extracted and printed for exchange with them alone.

The printing of these separate copies out of the printing fund of the Navy Department is problematical, and I would most earnestly urge that relief be granted the Observatory in this matter by having them printed regularly by Congress.

Very respectfully,

F. V. MCNAIR,
Captain, U. S. Navy, Superintendent.

HON. CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
Chairman Committee on Printing, United States Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the next paragraph of section 77, as follows:

Of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, 2,800 copies: 200 copies for the Senate, 600 copies for the House, and 2,000 copies for distribution by the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Mr. MANDERSON. After the word "survey," in line 27 of section 77, I move to insert:

One thousand five hundred copies of Part 1, 200 copies for the Senate, 600 copies for the House, and 700 copies for distribution by the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and—

And after the word "copies," in line 27, I move to insert "of Part 2;" so as to make the paragraph read:

Of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, 1,500 copies of Part 1, 200 copies for the Senate, 600 copies for the House, and 700 copies for distribution by the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey; and 2,800 copies of Part 2, 200 copies for the Senate, 600 copies for the House, and 2,000 copies for distribution by the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. I present a letter which I have received from Prof. Mendenhall, the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, giving the reasons for this change. The committee adopt his view upon the matter, and believe that this is a great economy and a better distribution, and will reach the purposes desired. I ask that the letter be printed in the RECORD in connection with the amendment just made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter will be printed in the RECORD if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

UNITED STATES COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY,
Washington, D. C., January 20, 1892.

DEAR GEN. MANDERSON: In response to your request, I send herewith memoranda of changes which are very desirable in the provisions of your bill regulating the public printing and distribution of public documents, as far as it relates to the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

In explanation of the first, I will say that it embodies a change I have been contemplating for some time under existing regulations, and is directly in the line of a more economical and sensible distribution pointed out by your bill. Our report has long been printed in one large quarto volume, so large and heavy that we are obliged to divide it to send it through the mails to foreign correspondents and exchanges. The first half of it relates chiefly to formal office reports, financial statements, statistics of work, including progress sketches which, although important to Congress and the Departments, and necessary for our own administration, has little, if any, interest to the general public and to professional men to whom our operations are of the greatest interest and value.

My proposition is to print in two parts, and provide a limited distribution of the first, as indicated in the proposed substitute. The 700 allotted to us will enable us to supply the principal libraries and such of our foreign exchanges as would value this part. The second part should be printed in octavo instead of quarto, would be a much more manageable volume, and would contain all of the important results of our work, with discussions, methods, etc. This would be the part which the engineers and surveyors would desire and be satisfied with. The cost by the proposed substitute would be, I think, nearly 20 per cent less than by the plan proposed in the bill, while the result would be vastly more satisfactory.

The change proposed in section 80, line 2, is simply explanatory of the word 'cost," and in accord with the present practice. The addition to line 4 is to provide for a very important and necessary distribution of charts to the principal libraries and institutions of learning in this country, where they are valued very highly, and from which we get, in many ways, returns of greater value than the material thus expended, and to foreign governments and cartographic bureaus and institutions whose charts, maps, etc., we receive in exchange, and which are of great value to us. This is in accord with long existing practice, and authorized by law as long ago as 1844. (Act of June 3.) In the act of 1878 this act is referred to, and it is stated that the distribution is to be "in accordance with the act of June 3, 1844."

I trust that the changes suggested may be incorporated in the bill, and I will be pleased to answer any further inquiries relating to them which you may desire to make.

I am, yours, faithfully,

T. C. MENDENHALL,
Superintendent.

Gen. CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

The Chief Clerk read to line 49 of section 77.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to inquire why so large a proportion of the reports of the Bureau of Ethnology is given that Bureau for distribution, when, as a general thing, other bureaus do not have the same proportionate number of books given to them. I know we have passed the clause, but I was busy at the time. I meant then to make the inquiry, or call the attention of the chairman to the particular paragraph.

Mr. MANDERSON. Is it at the foot of page 33, line 34?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; "1,000 for the Senate, 2,000 for the House, and 5,000 for distribution by the Bureau of Ethnology."

Now, go over a little further, on page 40, to the distribution of the report of the Smithsonian Institution. The character of the books does not differ so very much, but on line 199, page 40, of the report of the Smithsonian Institution, 10,000 copies are to be printed, "1,000 for the Senate, 2,000 for the House, 5,000 for distribution by the Smithsonian Institution, and 2,000 for distribution by the National Museum." But in a good many other cases the proportion is different. Take the report of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, "8,000 copies; 2,000 for the Senate, 4,000 for the House, and 2,000 for distribution by the Fish Commission." The proportion is entirely different in the different cases.

I would not speak about it if it were not for one thing, and that is, that every little while, and very soon after I get my quota of the report of the Ethnological Bureau, I begin to receive letters from all over the State indicating that, if people will apply to me, I can furnish them. They have evidently written to the Bureau of Ethnology and have received word from there that if they will write to their Member or Senator they can be supplied, but that the report can not be furnished by the Bureau.

Mr. MANDERSON. Of course I know nothing of the correspondence suggested by the Senator from Connecticut. The committee having this bill in charge for preparation found this to be the existing condition, that this large number of certain documents had been held from time almost immemorial by the bureaus themselves for distribution. I understand that the reason for it is largely this: Take the report of the Commissioner of Education. The Ethnological report, I believe, comes under the Smithsonian Institution rather than the Geological Survey, but it is under the direction of Maj. Powell, who is at the head of the Geological Survey. Take the report of the Smithsonian Institution itself. The matter that goes to make up these reports is contributed by scientists all over this country and perhaps all over the world; and that has been one reason probably why this large number has always been given to these bureaus by Congress. The committee want to make no startling change in that regard. It presumed that Congress in this respect had acted with that wisdom which usually characterizes the action of Congress, and especially of the Senate, as suggested by my colleague [Mr. HAWLEY], and did not want to strain the existing condition.

We have cut down the number of this report to be distributed by Congress, but we have not cut down the number to be distributed by the Bureau of Ethnology, presuming that they had some intelligent method of distribution by which from their quota they were keeping up in consecutive number full sets of these publications. If reference will be made to the testimony of Maj. Powell, the chief of the Geological Survey——

Mr. ALLISON. On what page?

Mr. MANDERSON. His statement is on page 220. In that statement will be found his account as to the method of distribution, which he seemed to think was a very admirable one, and I have no doubt but that it is. We did not feel like disturbing the action of Congress or the course which had been pursued by the different bureaus.

Mr. PLATT. I presume I am treading upon pretty dangerous ground, but I should like to inquire whether the Civil Service Commission have said anything about having a very excellent method of distribution for 20,000 copies of their report, of which the Senate gets only 1,000 copies and the House 2,000.

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, I think that will be found to be done for this reason. The Civil Service Commission has received by concurrent resolution of Congress this very large proportion of its report for several years past. I think perhaps it would be ascertained that of each annual report it has had about this number; and the reason the Commission has always urged upon Congress is that this was the best method by which it could instruct those who were seeking examination by that Commission. In the small pamphlet or report that is issued by the Commission there are the necessary forms and instructions for those who desire to be examined; and the Commission represents that it is cheaper, when application is made to it, to send this report, which contains the forms and instructions, than to send out a separate publication devoted to that particular purpose. I do not think that any more copies of the report are needed by Congress than it has received. But the Civil Service Commission has frequently urged that instead of 20,000 copies, there should be a substantial increase of that amount printed for distribution by it.

Mr. PLATT. I do not wish to be understood as complaining from a personal standpoint in this matter. I should be extremely obliged to this committee if they had taken away practically the entire distribution from Senators and Members of Congress. I do not believe that any Senator or any Member of Congress can make a very intelligent distribution of these documents without spending more time than he can afford to devote to that portion of his duties.

Mr. ALLISON. I should be glad to have the Senator in charge of the bill state what portion of Maj. Powell's testimony relates to a reduction in the number of copies to be printed of the report of the Ethnological Bureau.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Senator misunderstood me if he supposed that I said he would find in the testimony any suggestion as to a reduction in number.

Mr. ALLISON. I find that there is a reduction in the number.

Mr. MANDERSON. There is, and that was considered desirable by the committee in the interest of a proper economy, the committee believing that too many of these publications had heretofore been made.

Mr. ALLISON. My own experience and observation respecting the report of the Bureau of Ethnology is that I not only exhaust my own quota from year to year, but I am obliged frequently to make requests of Maj. Powell. I find in his testimony that he regards these reports as very valuable.

Mr. MANDERSON. Oh, yes.

Mr. PLATT. Very much sought for.

Mr. ALLISON. On page 233 he states in answer to an inquiry by the chairman that—

> The report of the Geological Survey and of the Bureau of Ethnology become with the lapse of time more and more valuable, so that institutions wanting the back numbers can not get them. * * * My second ethnological annual is selling for £5 in London to-day.

So that seems to be a very valuable report, and I should be glad to know why it is that such a large reduction is made to members of Congress from 7,500 to 2,000 copies practically? I do not oppose the reduction proposed by the committee, but it seems to me that these are very valuable reports, according to the statement of the chief of the Bureau.

Mr. MANDERSON. I imagine that to many individuals the report of the Bureau of Ethnology is a very valuable publication. It would be so to anyone with a scientific turn of mind. But I also realize, as I think the Senator will realize, that the reports of the Bureau of Ethnology, largely technical in their character, are to the great mass of people simply an attractive picture book.

Mr. ALLISON. The request for these annuals which I receive comes chiefly from the libraries of my State, and I receive a great number of them. It seems to me that 1,000 copies would hardly supply the libraries of the country.

Mr. MANDERSON. No, it would not.

Mr. ALLISON. Nor 2,000 copies.

Mr. MANDERSON. It would not; but the Senator must remember that it is not proposed to issue of the report of the Bureau of Ethnology 1,000 or 2,000 copies. It is proposed to issue——

Mr. ALLISON. It is proposed to give the chief of the Bureau 5,000 copies and Senators 1,000.

Mr. MANDERSON. More than that. Now, let us see what will be the operation of the bill as to the report of this particular Bureau. In the first place, it comes to Congress as one of the documents accompanying the message of the President of the United States, and as such the usual number, 1,862, as I recall it, is published. In addition to that, as a part of the full messages and documents, 1,000 copies are printed for the Senate and 2,000 for the House of Representatives. In addition to that, as a separate report of the Bureau of Ethnology, when it is ordered printed under the provision at the foot of page 33, the usual number is printed as a separate publication. So all the designated depositories of the United States and the State and Territorial libraries, numbering 496, are supplied out of the usual number. Then, in addition to that, there comes for distribution the 8,000 copies provided for in this section. It seemed to the committee that when these designated depositories and the State and Territorial libraries were supplied out of the usual number by two methods, first, as a part of the documents accompanying the message of the President and the reports of heads of Departments, and, next, as a separate publication, that with this additional number there would be enough.

Mr. ALLISON. I was not aware that there was any additional number to be printed except as stated here. My understanding of the reports of the Bureau of Ethnology is that they are not printed usually with the other public documents. They are generally a year or two behind. I should be glad to know of the Senator is he is certain——

Mr. COCKRELL. It is included, you mean, in the executive documents, unabridged?

Mr. ALLISON. No, I mean the full set of the documents.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think they go into the sets now.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think perhaps it is the fact that the report of the Bureau of Ethnology comes in as a Smithsonian Institution document.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it does, and in a separate form.

Mr. MANDERSON. That I referred to as being part of the messages and documents would be the report of the Superintendent of the Geological Survey, which is a report quite similar in its general characteristics.

Mr. COCKRELL. We used to get the messages and documents unabridged, and as I understood, that included all the Department reports of every kind. Now, since 1880, it is my recollection that we do not get any more messages and documents unabridged.

Mr. MANDERSON. No, you get the Abridgment of Messages and Documents.

Mr. COCKRELL. We have always gotten that. That is one volume. In 1874 and 1875 the messages and documents unabridged amounted to some eight or ten volumes, and for a number of years thereafter, but that has been discontinued. Now we get the messages and documents abridged. We get the report of the Secretary of War in so many volumes, the report of the Secretary of the Navy in so many volumes, the report of the Postmaster-General in so many volumes, and the reports of the different Departments, all in separate volumes, and we get them at different times and sometimes in different numbers.

Mr. MANDERSON. Let me interrupt the Senator to say that I think he will find that of the reserve number, which has been distributed in the manner with which we are all familiar, the messages and documents constitute a part.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not sure whether those that go to a Senator are marked or not. I have been trying for years to get something marked on the back of these volumes to indicate what was inside of them, but I have not been able to get it done.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is provided for in this bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. If they were marked as a report of the Secretary of War or of the head of any Department it would be a great deal better. I do not remember noticing about that; but I know we do not get them in distribution any longer as unabridged documents. They come in now as separate, independent reports.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to suggest to the Senator who has the bill in charge—I do not know whether it has been done or not—that the most important thing in connection with these publications is an editor who will edit them properly. For instance, the report of the Director of the Geological Survey is frequently bound up with the reports, I will say, of the Committee on Claims, or some other absolutely inconsequential thing, which nobody wants except the members of the committee. The volume is never marked on the back so that anybody can tell what it contains unless it may be somebody who can do it from memory, perhaps a librarian.

Mr. COCKRELL. You can not tell from memory, for the arrangement is different every year.

Mr. TELLER. That is the fact, I presume. You can not remember what is contained in the volumes, and therefore that part of the report is worthless for all practical purposes. The only value that the geological report has to anybody is that portion of it which is published as a separate document, which is a limited number. If they could have eliminated from them the mass of stuff and rubbish that comes in with them they might be of some value. The Senator is right about the ethnological report. The ethnological report is a Smithsonian report, and not a geological report. Each Senator will get 11 copies of that report under this bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment to call attention to what he has just suggested?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. MANDERSON. My colleague on the committee, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], congratulated the committee the other day that this bill was receiving so much of commendation in advance of reaching of its provisions. Here is another instance of the same fact. I recognize the difficulty as to the labeling on the backs of the books referred to by the Senator. If he will turn to section 86 he will find the very remedy for the difficulty he has complained of. That section reads:

SEC. 86. Every public document of sufficient size on any one subject shall be bound separately, and receive the title suggested by the subject of the volume, which shall be the chief title, and the classification of the volume shall be placed on the back at the bottom, as simply indicating its classification and not as a part of the title.

The executive and miscellaneous documents and the reports of each House of Congress shall be designated as "House documents," "Senate documents," "House reports," "Senate reports," thus making two classes for each House.

Obviating the unpleasant difficulty which the Senator has so properly referred to.

Mr. TELLER. That is a very good amendment in the present condition of things; but I wish to call the Senator's attention to the report of the Bureau of Ethnology, of which 8,000 copies are to be printed, 1,000 for the Senate, 2,000 for the House, and 5,000 for the Bureau of Ethnology.

The printing and binding of five or ten thousand more would be a very small sum compared with what it costs to get the report put in book form. The great expense of that Bureau is not the printing, but it is the work that precedes the printing, and it is a pretty large expense. The same may be said of the Geological Survey also. It seems to me when we have gone to such great expense—and this work is more called for than almost anything else that is published by the Government—it should be printed in numbers to meet at least the reasonable demand of libraries, the scientific people in the country, and that class of persons who have a right to expect, when the Government has expended a large sum of money in the publication of a document of this kind, that sufficient copies will be published, so that more than merely the favored few may have an opportunity to see it.

As the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] said, this is a document that we could distribute profitably in very great numbers. If they are worth publishing at all, they are worth publishing in sufficient quantities to reasonably meet the demand. I do not mean to say you can give to everybody a copy of these reports, but you can give to every public library, to every man who spends his money to create a library in the community in which he lives, as a great many do, and to private libraries an opportunity to get them. I do not know the fact, but I suppose a large number are sent abroad. It seems to me that the number could be increased very materially without any burden upon the Treasury.

Mr. WHITE. I should like to ask the Senator what is the relative cost of printing another copy—taking the cost of the volume as originally printed, what is the percentage of the increased cost of printing an additional copy after the forms are made up and the type set? I suppose it is the mere cost of the paper and the presswork. What proportion does that cost bear to the original cost of the book?

Mr. COCKRELL. What would be the difference, for instance, between 10,000 and 15,000 copies of the same book?

Mr. MANDERSON. That is a question which can not be answered with accuracy as to the percentage. It would depend upon the particular volume. Take a report, we will say, like that of the Commissioner of Education. After you have printed 10,000 copies of that report the cost of printing 5,000 more would simply be the cost of the paper, the cost of the presswork, and the cost of the binding—quite immaterial as compared with the cost of the original 5,000. But when you come to reports that are profusely illustrated, take, for instance, the report of the Bureau of Ethnology, which frequently has within it colored plates, then the cost is increased by the cost of those plates, always expensive, and dependent upon the number of colors introduced. No lithographic work of that kind, whether it is in white and black or in colors, is ever done at the Government Printing Office. There is no plant of that kind there. Under the operation of the statute such work is contracted for with lithographers, the lowest bidder who has reputation for good werk getting the contract. He owns the stones. He does not make a plate or stone and turn that over to the Government, but he holds the stones and owns them, because after they have performed this use they can be used for another purpose, and his contract price depends upon the number of plates that he is to furnish to the Government.

Mr. WHITE. That does not meet my difficulty. Suppose you contract with a lithographer for 5,000 lithographs, now the question is, what is the increased cost of contracting for 10,000?

Mr. MANDERSON. The percentage I can not give, but, of course, it is trifling as compared with the original cost, no doubt.

Mr. WHITE. That is what I think.

Mr. MANDERSON. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. WHITE. Then the economy effected by the diminution of the number of copies is insignificant?

Mr. MANDERSON. Insignificant in itself, but yet when you aggregate it as to all these publications, it amounts to a great deal. The saving in matter of crude material, the matter of paper, the material for the binding, the mechanical work by the printers, the pressmen, and the bookbinders as to a particular volume may be comparatively insignificant, but when you aggregate it in all these publications it runs into an enormous amount of money.

I want it to be understood that the committee have not aimed to be parsimonious or mean about this supply, but we were charged with the duty of making an inquiry and of cutting this supply down to the lowest possible number that would meet the demand. We may have erred in that, but it is very easy for members of the Senate, looking at this report and seeing in the annotations to this section what was the former number, to restore that number if they think it well. We are not tenacious for this number or tenacious for anything in this bill. We have simply, under orders of the Senate, attempted to perform what has been an unpleasant duty, because it has been one that has required an enormous amount of labor and of investigation, made, too, under very adverse circumstances. I simply desire when we come to the consideration of amendments other than those of the committee that Senators shall take the sense of the Senate upon any of these numbers.

I have an amendment, to come in on lines 42 and 45, which I should like to have now considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 77, line 42, it is proposed to strike out the word "four," before "thousand," and insert "five;" and in line 44, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one" and insert "two;" so as to read:

Of the bulletins of the Fish Commission, 5,000 copies; 1,000 for the Senate, 2,000 for the House, and 2,000 for distribution by the Commission.

Mr. MANDERSON. I make this proposed amendment based upon a letter from the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, which seems to give abundant reasons for it. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter referred to will be printed in the RECORD in the absence of objection.

The letter is as follows:

UNITED STATES COMMISSION OF FISH AND FISHERIES,
Washington, D. C., January 21, 1892.

SIR: I have the honor to request that a modification be made of Senate bill 1549 as far as it relates to the allotment to the United States Fish Commissioner of copies of its reports and bulletins, and especially the latter. In my response to the questions propounded by your honorable committee, I stated that the Commission needs at least 2,500 copies each of the report and bulletin to supply the demands upon it. With our present quota of the bulletin it is possible to fill only the requirements of our regular distribution list, and none are available for the numerous applicants who address the Commission. The demand for the publications is steady and constantly increasing, and it comes from persons whose requests ought to be granted.

I am very much surprised to find that upward of 200 copies of section 1, Fishery Industries, were in the Senate document room still unassigned at the beginning of the Fifty-first Congress.

Our invariable reply to applicants for this work for the past four years has been that it is out of print, the suggestion being made to them that they might be able to procure copies from second-hand book-dealers. The bulk of the applications made to the Commission for its publications come from fish and game protective associations, fish-culturists, State fish commissions, and others interested in fish and fisheries.

If the percentage of distribution by one or both Houses of Congress appears to be low, as shown in the report of your committee, page 464, the Commission could dispose of the surplus to very great advantage.

Hoping that my request will have your favorable consideration, and that you will assist in securing a proper recognition of our needs, I am,

Very respectfully,

M. MCDONALD, Commissioner.

Hon. C. F. MANDERSON,
Chairman Special Joint Committee on Printing,
United States Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of section 77 and read from line 46 to the end of line 74.

The clause from line 75 to line 83 of section 77 was read, as follows:

The Secretary of State shall cause to be printed and bound at the Government Printing Office as many volumes of the Revised Statues of the United States, the Supplement to the Revised Statues published under the act of June 7, 1880, and the second Supplement to the Revised Statutes authorized under the act of April 9, 1890, as he may deem needful for public distribution and for sale by his office at the cost thereof.

Mr. COCKRELL. That clause reads:

The Supplement to the Revised Statutes published under the act of June 7, 1880, and the second Supplement to the Revised Statutes authorized under the act of April 9, 1890.

Why do we authorize both of them?

Mr. MANDERSON. In this section we simply follow the existing law in that regard, adding to it the law passed last winter. I think the probabilities are that as the second edition of the supplement is complete in itself and contains all of the laws since the revision of 1878, perhaps that ought not to have been in, but the Senator will notice that it fixes no number for distribution. It simply authorizes the Secretary of State to publish such numbers as he may deem needful for public distribution and for sale.

Mr. COCKRELL. If we are going to act upon the principle of economy by restriction, I move to strike out the words "the Supplement to the Revised Statutes published under the act of June 7, 1880."

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not object to that.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no occasion for publishing that, simply because "the second Supplement to the Revised Statutes authorized under the act of April 9, 1890," contains all that the first one does.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not understand the amendment.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Senator from Missouri moves to strike out any authorization to the Secretary of State to print the first Supplement to the Revised Statutes.

Mr. COCKRELL. As I understand, the last Supplement, the second edition, as it is called, goes back to the Revised Statutes, and contains all since then up to the 3d of March, 1891.

Mr. MANDERSON. Commencing when?

Mr. COCKRELL. Commencing December, 1873. That is really the time the revision of the statutes commenced.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think the Senator is mistaken as to that. I think it goes back to 1878.

Mr. ALLISON. The new edition of the Revised Statutes was printed in 1878.

Mr. COCKRELL. The new edition of the Revised Statutes was printed in 1878. That goes back to the second edition or revision of the statutes in 1878, to the date that that brings them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 77, line 77, after the words "United States," it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the word "eighty," in line 79, as follows:

The Supplement to the Revised Statutes published under the act of June 7, 1880.

So as to read:

The Secretary of State shall cause to be printed and bound at the Government Printing Office as many volumes of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and the second Supplement to the Revised Statutes authorized under the act of April 9, 1890, as he may deem needful for public distribution and for sale by his office at the cost thereof.

Mr. ALLISON. Before that is agreed to, I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that this phraseology may be necessary in order to print the volume containing both of the Supplements. Under an act passed, I think, in 1890 the second Supplement was authorized, which was to bring the statutes down from the time of the first Supplement to that period. Therefore, there ought to be phraseology here which will cover both supplements. The Supplement authorized in 1890 only brings the statutes down from the time of the printing of the prior statutes.

Mr. COCKRELL. The best way will be to say "the Supplement to the Revised Statutes of the United States, volume 1, second edition, from 1874 to 1891." That ought to embrace it.

Mr. ALLISON. That will cover it. That is the volume the Senator has in his hand.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest that phraseology.

Mr. MANDERSON. While we are on this subject I wish to call the attention of the Senate—and I regret that the Senator's colleague [Mr. WILSON], who is the efficient chairman of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws, is not present——

Mr. ALLISON. He was here a moment ago.

Mr. MANDERSON. This seems to be the condition as to this revision of the statutes. There was a revision of the statutes authorized in 1874, or rather there came as the result of legislation prior to that time, the revision that we know as the revision of 1874, and then afterwards, in 1877, there was an authorization by Congress for another revision of the statutes. Under the construction placed upon that law by the State Department, those who revised the law and issued the Revised Statutes of 1878 took no notice of any new legislation between 1874 and 1878. They construed their duty to be to simply note in the revision of 1878 any changes that had been made in the statutes of a general character passed before 1874; so that there were no new laws to be found in the revision of 1878 which had passed between 1874 and 1878, and I think there is no lawyer who has had occasion to consult the Revised Statutes but has frequently been surprised that he has not been able to find in the revision of 1878 that which he knew was the law. The only recourse for him was to go to the Statutes at Large to find the new legislation between those years.

In 1880 there was a supplement to the Revised Statutes authorized to be published. That Supplement, as I understand it, took in for the first time all legislation anterior to the revision of 1874, and in that Supplement was found——

Mr. COCKRELL. Not anterior to the revision of 1874, but the revision of 1878.

Mr. MANDERSON. The revision of 1878, I should have said. As I understand it, this second supplement, or the second edition of the Supplement, to name it as it is, takes in all of the statute laws of general character after the revision of 1874. So it is complete in itself. Where one now has the Revised Statutes of 1874, and the second edition of the Supplement, he ought certainly to find, if the work has been well done—and I presume it has been, for Justice Richardson is a most careful compiler of statutes, and has done excellent work—he ought to find in those two volumes what the general law is upon any subject.

I make this general explanation because, having had a conversation with the Senator from Iowa upon that subject, he said he believed it was desirable to call the attention of the Senate to that fact, and he agrees with me that it will be a very excellent work for some committee of Congress or some commission to undertake to revise the statutes of the United States up to date and have annotated statutes which shall contain references, not only to the changes in the law, but to a greater degree than has heretofore been done, call attention to all the constructions placed on the statutes by the Supreme Court of the United States and perhaps the United States circuit court.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no question but what one supplement is all that is necessary, and that is the last one.

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the Senator from Iowa does not think the language there is sufficient, I suggest to him to say:

And the Supplement to the Revised Statutes of the United States, volume 1, second edition, 1874 to 1891, authorized under the act of April 9, 1890.

That will make it specific enough.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator be good enough to indicate the part in the clause which he desires to have stricken out?

Mr. COCKRELL. Strike out, beginning in line 77, the words:

The Supplement to the Revised Statutes, published under the act of June 7, 1880.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 77, on page 35, line 77, after the words "United States," it is proposed to strike out—

The Supplement to the Revised Statutes, published under the act of June 7, 1880.

And insert:

And the Supplement to the Revised Statutes of the United States, volume 1, second edition, 1874 to 1891, authorized under the act of April 9, 1890.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to make any criticism on the phraseology of this paragraph, but I do not quite comprehend what is meant in lines 81, 82, and 83. The Secretary of State is to cause to be printed the Revised Statutes first, and then the Supplement, and as many volumes "as he may deem 'needful' for public distribution and for sale at his office at the cost thereof."

I see further on that where the same phraseology is used there is a limitation of the number of copies. A new edition of the Revised Statutes and of this Supplement will be very large if the Secretary of State is authorized to publish all that may be needful for public distribution. It seems to me that there is an implication in that language that there is to be a free distribution of whatever the Secretary of State may think is necessary to be distributed free. I am sure that there will be a great many of these needed in my State, if they can be procured without cost to the attorneys.

Mr. COCKRELL. And there will be some few applications from Missouri if that is permitted.

Mr. MANDERSON. The startling proposition is true, that that is the present law, and that the Secretary of State has the right as to the Revised Statutes, within his discretion, as I recall it, to distribute and to sell the statutes. I suppose that Congress granting him this power has presumed that it would not be abused by him.

Mr. COCKRELL. He sells them now and makes an annual report about it, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. TELLER. They are sold for $2.90 a volume.

Mr. MANDERSON. This refers to the Revised Statutes, not the Statutes at Large.

Mr. TELLER. I am speaking of that.

Mr. COCKRELL. You can get all the bound volumes of the Statutes at Large and also the Supplement by paying for them at the Department. As I understand, this distribution by the Secretary of State is only a distribution to the depositories and places authorized by law to receive public documents.

Mr. TELLER. I think that is correct.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not understand that the Secretary of State can, under existing law, publish just as many copies of the Revised Statutes as he chooses and distribute them to Tom, Dick, and Harry.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not think it is so construed at all.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think he can. I think the distribution referred to there is a distribution to the designated depositories and institutions to which the Revised Statutes go.

Mr. CULLOM. That ought to be made plain, if it is not so.

Mr. ALLISON. In a subsequent provision for the distribution of copies of the session laws there is a very clear statement made as to the number, and then there is also a statement that—

The Secretary of State is authorized to have printed as many additional copies of the pamphlet laws as he may deem needful for distribution and sale by him, at cost price, not exceeding 1,000 copies of the laws of any one session in any one year.

So that there seems to be a limit there. I call attention to this so that there may be no mistake in the phraseology, because I think it would be unwise to furnish the Revised Statutes and the Supplement for general and universal distribution.

Mr. CULLOM. Or for sale.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it is well enough to print them for sale. I do not think there is any objection to that. The Supplements and the Revised Statutes are sent free to people who pay for them as a public document, being printed under the authority of the United States. I do not know precisely what phraseology would make that certain, but I think if it could be made more definite it would be wise to do it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest that the words "public distribution," in line 82, be stricken out and that the words "designated depositories" be inserted. That, I think, would cover the point.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is good, perhaps, as far as it goes, but I do not think the Statutes at Large, especially the very excellent second edition of the Supplement, should be confined to designated depositories. It certainly should go to all courts of the United States.

Mr. ALLISON. It should, and I think there is a provision that carries these statutes into all the courts.

Mr. MANDERSON. There is as to the Statutes at Large and the pamphlet laws. If this particular section may be passed for the present, I will attempt to prepare an amendment to it before we leave the bill which will reach the purpose. It is evidently the desire of the Senate to limit the power of distribution and not leave it subject to requisition in any number that the Secretary of State may see fit.

Mr. ALLISON. That was my idea.

Mr. MANDERSON. I will aim to make an amendment that shall reach that end.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska whether it is his purpose to complete the consideration of this bill to-night?

Mr. MANDERSON. I shall be very glad to do so if it is within the bounds of reasonable probability.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator cast his eye upon the clock and inform me whether he thinks it is within the bounds of probability?

Mr. MANDERSON. That depends upon how many suggestions I get from my brethren of the body. I am ready to submit to the pleasure of the Senate in reference to an adjournment, although I am exceedingly anxious to get through with this bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope the Senate will continue in session until 5 o'clock.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 9, 1892, at 12 o'clock meridian.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to make any point this morning in reference to this call on the day set apart for business from the Committee on the District of Columbia; but I do not want to feel committed to it, and hence waive the matter of objection only for the present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can make the point at any time hereafter he desires.

The committees were then called, when reports were severally submitted, ordered to be printed, and referred as indicated:

WATER WAY, LAKE SUPERIOR TO THE SEA.

By Mr. LIND, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce: A joint resolution (H. Res. 11) to promote the improvement of the water way from the head of Lake Superior by way of the Welland and St. Lawrence Canals and St. Lawrence River to the sea—to the House Calendar.

SPECIAL RATES TO COMMERCIAL TRAVELERS.

By Mr. RAYNER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with amendments: The bill (H. R. 372) to amend section 22 of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and amended March 2, 1889, so as to give common carriers the right to allow a greater weight of sample baggage to commercial travelers and their employés and reduced rates for transportation—to the House Calendar.

Mr. LIND. Mr. Speaker, in regard to the report just now submitted by the gentleman from Maryland, I desire in behalf of the minority to present their views in opposition.

The SPEAKER. The views of the minority will be printed, to accompany the report of the committee.

NICARAGUA SHIP CANAL.

Mr. BARTINE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the text of a petition relative to the construction of the Nicaragua Ship Canal. I will state that it is very brief.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not think the RECORD ought to be loaded down with the printing of petitions, Mr. Speaker. I think it is unwise to begin this practice.

Mr. BARTINE. I will state to the gentleman that this is quite brief. It will not make ten lines.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It had better be presented and referred under the rule in the usual way.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Under the rule this day is set apart for business from the Committee on the District of Columbia, if the committee desires to occupy the time.

RESPITES AND PARDONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 4429) to empower the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to grant respites and pardons in certain cases.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may grant pardons and respites for offenses against the late corporation of Washington, the ordinances of Georgetown and the levy court, the laws enacted by the legislative assembly, and the police and building regulations of the District.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred House bill No. 4429, entitled a bill "To empower the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to grant respites and pardons in certain cases," has considered the same and reports it back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The letter of the Commissioners, hereto appended, and made part of this report, gives the general reasons for the passage of the bill.

WASHINGTON, January 20, 1892.

SIR: The Commissioners have the honor to transmit herewith draft of a bill to authorize the Commissioners to grant pardons and respites for offenses the punishment for which is commitment to the municipal workhouse in default of the payment of the fine. The object of this bill is to confer on the Commissioners the power possessed by the executives of the former municipal corporations which were in force in this District prior to the establishment of a single government for the District of Columbia. The law which abolished those corporations continued in force all valid laws and ordinances which those corporations had enacted, but did not transmit to the Commissioners the power to grant respites and pardons for offenses against those laws and ordinances. The lack of this power prevents the Commissioners from exercising executive clemency in many cases where it is obviously in the interest of public morals and justice to abate such sentences or diminish their severity.

Respectfully,

J. W. DOUGLASS, President.

Hon. J. J. HEMPHILL,
Chairman House Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman from South Carolina allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. Where is the pardoning power now lodged that you seek to confer upon these Commissioners?

Mr. HEMPHILL. There is no pardoning power for these small offenses, and we simply desire to confer it upon the Commissioners of the District.

I move the passage of the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. I was unable to distinctly hear the reading of the bill, owing to the confusion on the floor. I would like to know whether it provides that the Commissioners shall be unanimous, or that a majority of them may exercise the pardoning power?

Mr. HEMPHILL. It says "the Board of Commissioners," and I suppose it takes a majority to act.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. You are not certain about that?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Well, they are to act as a board, and I think it is safe to say, as a general proposition, that the majority can act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

NATIONAL SAFE DEPOSIT COMPANY, WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 4197) to change the corporate name of the National Safety Deposit Company of Washington.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the corporate name of the National Safe Deposit Company of Washington, a body corporate now doing business in the District of Columbia, and incorporated under an act of Congress entitled "An act to incorporate the National Safe Deposit Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, changed to, and shall hereafter be, "The National Safe Deposit, Savings, and Trust Company of the District of Columbia."

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, this simply proposes to authorize this company to change its name in conformity with the powers granted by the recent act of Congress.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid upon the table.

ECKINGTON AND SOLDIERS' HOME RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I call up the bill (H. R. 410) to amend the charter of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the charter of the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railway Company be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize said company to lay its tracks and to run its cars thereon through and along the following-named streets and avenues: Beginning at the intersection of Fifth and G streets northwest, east along G street to New Jersey avenue; thence southeasterly along New Jersey avenue to C street northwest; thence east along C street to North Capitol street, and thence south along North Capitol street to B street north, and also beginning at the intersection of G street and New Jersey avenue, east to Massachusetts avenue; thence southeasterly along Massachusetts avenue to North Capitol street, and thence north along North Capitol street to New York avenue, connecting with its main line and North Capitol street branch: Provided, That if electric wires or cables are used to propel its cars over any of the routes hereby authorized within the limits of the city of Washington the same shall be placed under ground. Wherever the foregoing route or routes may coincide with the duly authorized route or routes of any other duly incorporated street railway company in the District of Columbia, both companies shall use the same tracks upon such fair and equitable terms as may be agreed upon by said companies; and in the event said companies shall fail to agree upon equitable terms, either of said companies may apply by petition to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which shall hear and determine summarily the matter in due form of law, and adjudge to the proper party the amount of compensation to be paid therefor. Said company shall charge not exceeding 5 cents fare for one continuous ride from any point on its line to the terminus of its main line or any of its branches.

SEC. 2. That said company is authorized to increase its capital stock $300,000 for the purpose of enabling it to extend and equip its line as provided in this act.

SEC. 3. That unless said extensions are commenced within three months and the cars run thereon within one year from the passage of this act, the authority hereby granted shall be void: Provided, That said railroad shall be constructed on such grade and in such manner as shall be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 4. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The SPEAKER. Has this bill been reported by a committee?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will state that this bill has been unanimously agreed upon by the committee, and that it was ordered to be favorably reported to the House. It was reported this morning, but the report has not been printed. The reason why it was not reported before was on account of the sickness of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD], who had the bill in charge.

Mr. SEERLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], who is in charge of the bill. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SEERLEY] will be recognized later.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Mr. Speaker, this bill is simply an amendment to a charter granted by the House of Representatives some years ago to what is known as the Eckington and Soldiers' Home Railroad Company. Gentlemen at all acquainted with the city will remember that the road runs from the Treasury Department, opposite the Riggs House, on G street, down toward the Pension Building, and from there it turns to the left and goes out to what is known as the Soldiers' Home, and a little suburb which is called Eckington. This bill provides that when it gets down to this side of the Pension Office it shall run up to the Capitol, so that persons can go from the Capitol to the Treasury Department by the Pension Office and the Interior and Post-Office Departments by this route. It provides that it shall also extend its route so as to give a connection between the Capitol and the Government Printing Office.

Mr. TURNER. I will ask the gentleman how the road is to get onto the hill.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The gentleman from Georgia asks me how it gets onto Capitol Hill. It comes up on the other side of the Capitol, over here next to the Senate wing.

Mr. HEARD. Over the tracks of the Metropolitan Railway.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Over the tracks of the Metropolitan Railway Company, as I understand from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD].

Mr. LONG. Is any appropriation called for?

Mr. HEMPHILL. No, sir; no appropriation is called for.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Was the bill reported this morning?

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will state to the gentleman that the bill was agreed upon by the committee some time ago and put into the hands of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD]——

Mr. HEARD. On last Friday.

Mr. HEMPHILL. On last Friday, as stated by the gentleman, with instructions to report it to the House, but it has not been reported until this morning on account of the sickness of the gentleman [Mr. HEARD].

Mr. BUSHNELL. Is it on the Calendar?

Mr. HEMPHILL. It is not on the Calendar of the House; no, sir.

Mr. BUSHNELL. What is the number of the bill?

Mr. HEARD. Four hundred and ten.

Mr. OATES. I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL] whether he thinks the maximum of 5-cent fares is not rather high?

Mr. HEARD. The original charter, of which this is amendatory, requires them to sell six tickets for a quarter.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The same as all other roads?

Mr. OATES. I heard the expression in the bill, "not exceeding 5-cent fares."

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from South Carolina how much is the authorized increase of capital stock?

Mr. HEMPHILL. Three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to inquire if there is any objection to the running of this street railway along the streets named, on the part of property owners on the street or the city authorities?

Mr. HEMPHILL. The city authorities report in favor of the bill. Only one gentleman has objected to it, and he does not live on the streets where it passes, and he had an opportunity to appear before the committee and did not, but wrote a letter objecting to the extension. Then, there are some people in a place called Brookland, where this road runs, who object to the passage of the bill, because the company does not give them trains as often as they desire.

Mr. HEARD. If the gentleman from South Carolina will allow me, I will state that that is on the original road and not on the extension, which is practically without opposition.

Mr. HEMPHILL. If no other gentleman requires information in regard to this matter, I move the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. SEERLEY. I, for one, ask more information than I have thus far been able to secure. I do not see the reason why this report was made this morning and this House should be asked to grant rights without knowing anything about it; and therefore I am unwilling to grant those rights without further information and opportunity to consider the matter.

Mr. HEMPHILL. As I said before, there is a report; but the gentleman who had the bill in charge was not able to make the report by reason of sickness. The report is already printed. It is a very simple matter as to whether this railroad shall be permitted to come to the Capitol and go by the way of the Government Printing Office.

Mr. SEERLEY. Is there any reason why it can not go over until next week?

Mr. HEMPHILL. It is all the business that we have now ready for this day, which is set apart for the consideration of District business; and we have only one day in two weeks.

Mr. SEERLEY. I oppose granting any rights of this kind until this House has had opportunity to examine the bill and report.

Mr. HEARD. I will state to the gentleman from Iowa that on last Friday the Committee on the District of Columbia unanimously authorized me to report the bill. I prepared the report and had it typewritten by Friday evening. On Saturday morning I came here, although sick, feeling that as we had but little work on our Calendar for the District of Columbia, and as we only had a day every two weeks, I felt that being in a measure responsible for getting the bill ready by to-day I came Saturday morning to make the report; but by reason of the order under which the House adjourned on Friday it was impossible to make the report then, as the gentleman understands. Therefore, I made the report this morning, but in order to have the printed report here to-day I got the bill clerk to have it set up in type Saturday so that it would be ready to lay before members of the House this morning. The report is in print and will be here shortly. If the gentleman prefers to have the bill lie over for any reason I would ask the gentleman from South Carolina to let it take that course.

Mr. SEERLEY. I do not know that I object to the bill; but I want to know what it is.

Mr. HEARD. If it is desirable, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa and other members of the House who feel an interest in the matter, that this is simply an extension of the track of a railroad that is already in existence in the District of Columbia, to the Capitol and from the Capitol by the Government Printing Office on North Capitol Street. On G Street, on which this road now runs, there is a building being constructed which has been leased by the Government for a temporary city post-office, and it is to be used very soon and leased for a period of three or five years. There is no herdic or street-car line on that road except this, and on that account it would be an advantage to have it extended to the Capitol and by the Government Printing Office.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. What is the length of the proposed extension?

Mr. HEARD. The proposed extension is something over a mile.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. And you authorize them to issue $300,000 of capital stock?

Mr. HEARD. I will explain to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, if I can have the attention of the House for a moment why the increase of capital stock asked for is $300,000. When this company was organized in this city it was the pioneer in electric railroads in the District. According to the estimates then made by Lieut. Griffin, formerly an army officer, and an expert in electrical matters, who was before our committee in the Fiftieth Congress, the probable cost of the road would be $350,000. They found, however, by experience that the expense of building the road now constructed overwent that expense by more than $160,000.

The equipment of the line, Mr. Speaker, so far as it has gone under the law, with the cost of the storage batteries cars of $9,000 each, has proved that the capital stock originally authorized to be issued, was too small. Of the original stock authorized 80 per cent has been paid in, and the company has been obliged to go into debt $170,000 to build and equip the road they have now. The $300,000 increase of capital stock that is authorized under the bill, will enable them, by paying up all stock in full to pay for the equipment they now have, to fully construct and equip the new road, and to pay off the debt in full. That is the reason why they ask the authorization of the issue of an additional $300,000 stock—to enable them to take up the bonds for about $160,000 which they have issued for the completion and equipment of the present road.

I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. O'NEIL] that it is in the interest of every taxpayer of the District, for the reason that if the stock is issued it will represent the value of the road, and it will be taxed at its value and in this District, while the bonds outstanding may pay no tax here.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. I do not see that you have a single provision in this bill which compels this company to pay its debts.

Mr. HEARD. If the gentleman desires to have incorporated in the bill a provision which will compel this company to apply the necessary part of this money to the taking up of their debts already incurred in building and equipping the road, I will consent to it.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. I think you had better let the bill go over.

Mr. HEARD. Well, Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, I am willing that it should take that course. If the gentleman from South Carolina has the mind to do so, he may let the matter go over until the report is brought in, if he has other work to do.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that I have no other business to present to the House, and therefore I make this report——

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Missouri had better let it go over.

Mr. HEARD. Put in the amendment that you desire.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. You had better let it go over.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that this bill has been before the House for thirty days. This company has made the best improvements that have been made in the District by a street railroad company.

I think that can be stated without the slightest fear of contradiction. They have paid a large sum of money into the treasury of the District in taxes and private assessments. They have paid within the last few days one bill of over $8,000, for paving the streets of this city. There can be no objection to the bill, and if the House want the road let them vote for it; or, if they do not, let them kill it.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be understood as being opposed to the extension of this line, but what I am opposed to is the authorization of a capitalization away beyond the cost of building these roads. We have the Washington and Georgetown Railroad as a striking example. There has been about $25 or $30 per share paid in upon the total capitalization of that road, and its stock sells for 230, and at the last sale it sold for 285. There has not been a charter for a street railroad which has gone through Congress for years that has not allowed an almost unlimited watering of stock.

Mr. HEARD. The gentleman is clearly mistaken.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The gentleman states what is not so when he makes that statement. That is all there is to that.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. It can not be denied, Mr. Speaker, that what I have said about the Washington and Georgetown Railroad is absolutely true.

Mr. HEMPHILL. The Washington and Georgetown Railroad was chartered long before we came here.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I want to correct the gentleman from Massachusetts for his own sake, as well as in justice to the facts of this case. The Washington and Georgetown Railroad, of which he speaks, has a capitalization of, I believe, $500,000 only, and the property is worth three or four millions. It was built by the issue of bonds, and those bonds are held and taxed in Boston, Baltimore, and New York, and elsewhere. If it had been paid for out of the stock issued, so that the stock represented the value of the property, that stock would be taxable here, just as we propose to make this property. Now, this Eckington company had in the first place an issue of $350,000, which proved to be insufficient to build the road. It has 5¼ miles of double track, or 11 miles of single track, and it is known to every gentleman who knows anything about the character of the road at all to be, perhaps, the best built road in the world to-day. Certainly it is the best road in the city, and the best equipped. The $350,000 issue of stock, as appears by the books, was $160,000 short of the amount required for the construction of the road, and the reason they ask for this additional issue is to take up that $160,000 and to pay for the storage-battery cars now in use and hereafter to be used in further equipping the line.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. Why did you not put that in your bill?

Mr. HEARD. Because we supposed that the House would be willing to accept our statement as to the facts. I have no objection, however, to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and if he will permit me I will draw that amendment so as to make this issue of stock applicable to taking up the indebtedness already incurred so far as necessary.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. That ought to be in the bill. It is the duty of the committee to bring in a proper bill.

Mr. HEARD. Well, I say I think that amendment is a proper one and I am willing to accept it.

Mr. SEERLEY. Will the gentleman from Missouri permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEARD. Certainly.

Mr. SEERLEY. Supposing this company makes 30 or 40 per cent on its capital stock, is there anything in the bill which provides that the city or the District of Columbia shall get any benefit from it?

Mr. HEARD. Yes, sir. I will say to the gentleman that the original charter, of which this is amendatory, requires a full statement to be filed, showing who are the stockholders and the amount of money received, and how disposed of. I will say further, in justice to this company, that they have built a good road. The stockholders, ten or twelve of them, have put in the money to do the work to a great extent, and they borrowed the money necessary to complete the road. They have not one single salaried officer in the company, and yet the receipts just about meet the expenditures necessary to its operation.

Mr. SEERLEY. One other question. If this is an honest bill, as I take it to be, what is the objection to letting it go over for one week, so that members of this House may have an opportunity to examine into its features?

Mr. HEARD. If the gentleman is familiar with the rules of the House he knows that if the bill goes over now it goes over for at least two weeks. So far as I am concerned I have no objection whatever to letting it go over except that which arises from my desire to expedite the business of the House as much as possible. This bill was unanimously reported by our committee. I have never known a bill to which there has been less opposition manifested, either in the committee or elsewhere. It is a bill intended to effect an important public good; it has been reported without opposition, and I think the House ought to dispose of it promptly.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. In estimating the cost of construction of this road, which is a road built for the purpose of selling land rather than for the purpose of carrying passengers, the passenger business being only an incident—in estimating the cost of the construction of the road is the cost of the right of way put in?

Mr. HEARD. The right of way which they have had to pay for is certainly included.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. Why should it be? Because ultimately this is intended to be a public highway——

Mr. HEARD. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that, so far as this road has been constructed over the streets and avenues of the city, there has been no right of way paid for. There is one section of the road beyond Eckington—between there and the Soldiers' Home, where, as I am advised, these gentlemen have paid a considerable sum for the right of way—how much I am not advised; but they have paid for the right of way wherever the road went through private property not owned by themselves.

Mr. SEERLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD] yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SEERLEY]?

Mr. SEERLEY. I move that the further consideration of this bill be postponed for two weeks.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. HEARD. I thought the gentleman's purpose was to ask me a question. I do not yield to him to make the motion he has indicated. If the bill is to be withdrawn from the consideration of the House I prefer that it be done by the committee.

Mr. SEERLEY. So do I; but if the committee will not do it, I want to make the motion myself.

Mr. HEARD. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HEMPHILL], the chairman of the committee, as a matter of personal preference and perhaps in justice to all concerned, that the bill be laid over until the next District day. There is nothing in the bill which will not bear the closest scrutiny; and rather than have any contention about it—rather than have the committee placed in any embarrassing position—I would prefer myself that the bill go over.

Mr. HEMPHILL. Any action which the House may take on this question will not put me personally in an "embarrassing position." The bill has been reported by the committee unanimously; and the report in its favor from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia was also unanimous. Not a single protest has been entered against the measure by any person owning property along the route. The proposed improvement seems to me the best that has been made in this city with reference to street-car transportation within the six or eight years that I have been a member of Congress. The measure contemplates simply giving to members of this House and to the public an opportunity to reach the public buildings of the city, especially the Capitol and the Printing Office, by railway instead of being obliged in many cases to go by cab. The Metropolitan Railway, known as the F street road, gets now all the travel going from the Capitol to the part of the city which will be reached by this proposed line. Therefore it is not unreasonable that there should be some opposition to this bill. So far as I am concerned, I am convinced that this is not only a desirable but an important improvement to the city.

The stock of this company has not been watered. It is not worth to-day upon the market what has been paid in by a considerable sum. Not a single officer of the road draws a cent of salary. So far as the offices are concerned, the road is run without expense, so as to enable the corporation to keep the business going.

Mr. SEERLEY. The gentleman says that these officers are drawing no salary. Are they running this road for the public benefit without any private benefit at all?

Mr. HEMPHILL. They expect of course to reap benefit eventually.

Mr. HEARD. Because they own the stock.

Mr. HEMPHILL. But the road thus far has not paid a cent in dividends; and the information of the committee is that it will not pay a dividend for at least five years. Of course if the company obtains additional facilities the property may improve more rapidly. That of course is understood; otherwise these men would not ask this extension of their line. The question is simply whether we shall grant this company the privilege of extending their road to the Capitol and the Printing Office. That is all there is in it. If the House chooses to grant it, well and good; if not, members must suffer the penalty of being obliged to patronize the F street line alone. That is the substance of the whole business.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. What length of line does this bill add to the existing line?

Mr. HEMPHILL. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD] can answer that question. He has been over the matter more carefully than I have. I will ask the gentleman from Missouri to state what length of line this bill will add?

Mr. HEARD. The present length of line is about 11 miles single track, or 5½ miles double track.

Mr. HEMPHILL. How much will be added by this bill?

Mr. HEARD. About a mile of double track. The entire road is now about 5½ miles, double track.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. I asked how much of an extension would be granted by this bill. I understand the gentleman to say about a mile.

Mr. HEARD. About a mile.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. How much do you propose to increase the capital stock?

Mr. HEARD. I made a statement on that point a few moments ago. The gentleman probably was not in his seat.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. I was in my seat, but I could not hear the friendly conversation which was carried on between gentlemen over there.

Mr. HEARD. I will say to the gentleman from New Jersey that the present application is for an increase of $300,000, which will make the entire capitalization of this road (11 or 12 miles in length of single track) $650,000. When this road was commenced it was an experiment so far as the building of an electric road was concerned. An estimate made by Lieut. Griffin, formerly of the Army, who has been connected with the District government, was furnished to the committee in the Fiftieth Congress as a basis of what amount we should allow originally for the capital stock.

His estimate was that it would take $350,000, but completing the construction and equipment of the road proved to be much more expensive, and the books of the company will show that it has overgone the estimate by about $160,000 or $170,000. This issue of stock authorized by the present bill is designed to take up the $160,000 or $170,000 of indebtedness incurred in completing and equipping the road now built and to build and complete the equipment of the new line contemplated, and it will take all of the money here authorized for that purpose.

I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, he having objected that there was no provision in the bill requiring a portion of the money so raised to be applied to the liquidation of the outstanding indebtedness, that I have now prepared an amendment which will require the application of a portion of the money to the liquidation of the debt not incurred in the operation of the road, but incurred in its actual construction and equipment.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. A very proper amendment.

Mr. HEARD. I send it to the desk and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "act," in line 4 of section 2, add:
"And to liquidate the present indebtedness incurred in completing and equipping the road already constructed."

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. And that no bonds shall be issued in place of the bonds so redeemed.

Mr. HEARD. No; the object is to take up the old bonds, to pay off the indebtedness.

Mr. SEERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the further consideration of this bill and the amendment be postponed for two weeks.

Mr. HEARD. I suppose that motion is debatable. I wish to be heard for a moment upon it.

Mr. Speaker, I think that I have indicated to the House a disposition not to be captious or arbitrary with regard to considering fairly any objections which may be made to this bill. I have endeavored to meet every point which has been urged against it, and remove by amendment the objections which have been suggested in opposition. And since the only objection offered to the bill has been met, and will be entirely cured by the amendment I have offered, I hope the House will not agree to lay aside the consideration of the bill as proposed, but will complete it now.

It has been stated by the gentleman from South Carolina, chairman of the committee, that the only persons who objected to the road had a hearing before the District Commissioners. These objectors were, none of them, from persons living along the line of the road; and they objected not to the construction of this important connection or link, but objected to the number of trains run every day on a certain part of the road running far out into the country.

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia heard the complaints and unanimously disapproved of them. Our committee did the same, and we also believed the complaints had no just foundation. And there is, I will say, less opposition to the passage of this bill than I have ever know to any bill so important to the public in this District. It is designed to give, as has been stated by the gentleman from South Carolina, an independent line and direct connection between the Capitol and the Treasury Department, and by the transfer arrangement now in operation with the Washington and Georgetown road to Georgetown and all intermediate points.

This has never before been had, and I will also state that on this line—on the main line—the building erected for the new city post-office is situated, and will be accessible directly from here by no other line. This also provides for a direct connection between the Capitol and Government Printing Office, a very important matter to those of us who have occasion to go down there, as well as to the general public.

Mr. Speaker, I believe I have never had occasion to offer a bill to the House which presented so little that was objectionable, and which promised more of public good and benefit as an equivalent for the franchise asked than the present one.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HEARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I understood the gentleman to say that some parties had objected—parties living along the line of the road. Where were they?

Mr. HEARD. I will state to the gentleman from Iowa that one of them was made by a gentleman living right here near the corner of New Jersey avenue and B street—one door from the avenue on B street. He objected to the extension of the road because it would make too much noise, although the projected line is a block away from him, and although he has voluntarily located himself within one block of the steam railroad down here at the Baltimore and Ohio depot.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. And only one block away from this Hall. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEARD. He is only one block from the steam-railroad station of the Baltimore and Ohio road, where he located voluntarily, and yet he objects to this extension on account of its noise, which can be no possible annoyance to him.

Another objection comes from a little hamlet out in the country known as Brookland, a half mile or more from the end of the road. I will state that this little village has, as I am advised, some sixty houses. It is half a mile from the road, on the Metropolitan Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio road.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Beyond Eckington?

Mr. HEARD. Yes. I will state that before this Eckington and Soldiers' Home road was constructed they had access to this city only by the railroad trains on the Baltimore and Ohio road, a few trains a day stopping there, whereas they now have seventy-two trains on this road.

Mr. STOCKDALE. What is the objection they make?

Mr. HEARD. Because they do not run the trains every ten minutes while the schedule gives them a train every twelve minutes. [Laughter.] As I stated, they have now seventy-two trains a day, and before the construction of this road they had perhaps but two or three a day on the Metropolitan Branch.

One mile of the track before reaching this village passes through a region where there is not a single house. They are running a mile through the country to bring the conveniences of the road to these people. The fact is that these objectors have derived more benefit than any other people in the District of Columbia from the construction of the road, in proportion to what they pay, and they are complaining now of the schedule run by the road, and not objecting to the extension asked here.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. This is a sort of back fire at the other end.

Mr. HEARD. Yes; an opposition from an unlooked-for quarter. And, although the road is run largely for their benefit, as the books of the road show, and the officers' statements demonstrate, that the receipts from this point actually do not pay for the axle grease used on the cars on that end of the line to give these people their seventy-two trains a day.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. I have drawn a little amendment, to modify the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD].

Mr. SEERLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. HEARD. I do not wish to yield the floor. I will yield for an inquiry, but I do not desire to do so for anything further.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SEERLEY] desires to be recognized in his own right.

Mr. HEARD. I must decline to yield for the present.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. Would the gentleman from Missouri object to this amendment, to add at the end of the second section the following:

And to redeem bonds issued to take care of present indebtedness incurred in building and equipping the road already constructed, and no additional bonds shall be issued by said company without special authority of Congress.

Mr. HEARD. I am perfectly willing to accept that. It carries out the intent of these people, and I will be glad to have it offered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the motion now is to postpone, and the amendment is not in order at this time.

Mr. HEARD. As that amendment is a modification of the amendment which I offered, I would ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SEERLEY] to withhold his motion till the amendment can be perfected, so as to express the purpose desired.

Mr. SEERLEY. I waited for the gentleman to take this action, and he did not do it.

Mr. HEARD. Let the gentleman make his motion, then.

Mr. SEERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise at this time to say that I am opposed to this bill, but I do say that the only reason I can see why there is not something back of this bill is the high character of the gentleman who is presenting it here [Mr. HEMPHILL]. It seems to me, if this is an honest bill, there can be no objection to letting the members of this House have two weeks for its consideration, and that is all that has been asked by myself. I say it seems strange that this bill has to be railroaded through in an hour here this morning. Here is a bill that was not reported until this morning, and they ask us now to take it up and pass it, important as it is, without our knowing anything about it.

Mr. BUSHNELL. It is not on the Calendar.

Mr. SEERLEY. That is all I have to say. I do not say this bill is a vicious one, but I do say that the House ought to have time to consider it. I move the previous question on my motion.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I hope the gentleman will not try to cut off debate in this way.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves to postpone the further consideration of the bill for two weeks——

Mr. HEMPHILL. I trust the gentleman will not undertake to take snap judgment on the committee in this way.

The SPEAKER (continuing). And on that motion he demands the previous question.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative.

So the previous question was refused.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I desire to say that the House is in full possession of every fact that we have.

Mr. HEARD. That is true.

Mr. HEMPHILL. If the House chooses to pass the bill, let us do it. If the House does not believe the bill ought to be passed, then let it be killed. That is all there is to it.

Mr. BUTLER. I am free to say that I do not know whether I favor this bill or not, but I would like time enough to investigate it. I can not understand at all why a bill that is reported this morning for the first time, the report upon which has not been printed and which has not come into our possession, a bill which is not even on the Calendar, should be called up in this way and that we should be compelled to vote upon it to-day without knowing whether we favor it or not. I shall not vote for any bill that I do not understand, and yet I think perhaps if I had time enough to examine it I might approve it, and I think we are asking none too much to have time in which to consider this bill quietly by ourselves. Therefore I favor the motion to postpone for two weeks.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SEERLEY] to postpone for two weeks.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SEERLEY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. HEARD. Now I ask——

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HEARD. As amended by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. O'NEIL].

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not informed that the gentleman from Massachusetts offered any amendment.

Mr. HEARD. I will ask permission to withdraw my amendment in order to allow the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. O'NEIL] to present another amendment, which has been sent to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts:

Add to section 2 the following:

"And to redeem bonds issued to take care of present indebtedness incurred in building and equipping the road already constructed, and no additional bonds shall be issued by said company without special authority of Congress."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid upon the table.

Mr. HEMPHILL. I desire to say that the Committee on the District of Columbia has no further business to present to the House this morning.

ADDRESSES UPON EX-SPEAKERS RANDALL AND GROW.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to submit a concurrent resolution and a report from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. A privileged report?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir, I can not say that it is privileged.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee have considered the House resolution introduced by Mr. POWERS on January 21 "to print 5,000 copies of the proceedings of the House attending the presentation to the House by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania of the portraits of the Hon. Galusha A. Grow and Hon. Samuel J. Randall," and direct me to report, as a substitute therefor, a concurrent resolution, which is herewith submitted, and to recommend the passage of the same.

The printing provided for in said resolution will cost more than $500, and therefore it can not be ordered by the House by a simple resolution. The committee recommend that such resolution lie on the table, and, as stated, that the substitute therefor do pass.

The estimated cost of printing 10,000 copies, as provided in the concurrent resolution, will be about $2,900.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now the concurrent resolution should be read, Mr. Speaker.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 10,000 copies of the addresses delivered in the House of Representatives on January 21, 1892, upon the presentation of the portraits of Hon. Galusha A. Grow and Hon. Samuel J. Randall by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. That out of this number the Public Printer will deliver 50 copies to Mr. Grow, 50 copies to Mrs. Samuel J. Randall, 100 copies to the committee of the Pennsylvania Legislature touching said portraits, and the remainder to the House for the use of Members and Delegates.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move the previous question on the adoption of the substitute.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the substitute for the concurrent resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the original resolution will be ordered to lie on the table.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will proceed to call the committees regularly for one hour, upon which call each committee on being named shall have the right to call up for consideration any bill reported by it on a previous day on either the House or Union Calendar.

The morning hour commenced at 1 o'clock and 5 minutes.

WORLD'S COLUMBIAN EXPOSITION.

When the Committee on Appropriations was called,

Mr. SAYERS said: Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the resolution which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and reported back.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the resolution asking for information touching the management of the World's Fair and expenditures therefor, having considered the same, report herewith and recommend the adoption of the accompanying substitute therefor:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
In the House of Representatives, January 5, 1892.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa submitted the following; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations:

Whereas Congress, by act approved April 25, 1890, provided for holding an International Exposition of the progress made in civilization, at the city of Chicago, in 1893, to commemorate the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Columbus; and

Whereas the act designating Chicago as the site of said Exposition required the people of that city to provide a suitable site and $10,000,000 to complete the appropriation for holding said Exposition; and

Whereas in response to the requirements of said act, the citizens of Chicago have furnished a site and provided over $10,000,000, a sum deemed adequate by Congress; and

Whereas fifty-nine nations have accepted the invitation of the Government of the United States to be present and participate in said Exposition, and fifty States and Territories of the Federal Union have indicated their intention to participate, and have expressed their desire that said exhibition shall in all things be commensurate with the importance of the event to be celebrated, and be worthy of the wealth and character of the United States; and

Therefore, in order that Congress may be fully advised as to the scope and plan adopted by those having jurisdiction and management of said Exposition, and also concerning the progress made, the amount of money expended, the manner of such expenditures, and the necessity therefor, together with such further information concerning the amount available for said work, and the sum that may become necessary to complete the same and prepare the Exposition for opening its gates to visitors,

Be it resolved, That an inquiry be, and is hereby, ordered to ascertain whether those obligated and undertaking to do so have justly and properly complied with the requirements of the said act of Congress approved April 25, 1890, and the subsequent appropriations made for said Exposition; whether the money provided has been judiciously expended; whether the number of employés and appointees to carry out and into effect the laws is excessive and their compensation reasonable or otherwise; and to ascertain and report the salary or compensation paid to each officer and employé; from what States the several appointments have been made, and, generally, whether in the care and conduct of the Exposition proper management has been had; and that a full report of those in charge of the expenditure of money be made of all such expenditures; and that copies of the monthly pay rolls of all officers and appointees be transmitted to Congress for its full information; and that the report based upon said inquiry may be made at any time to Congress, but at the earliest day possible consistent with the necessities of the inquiries involved in this resolution.

Attest:

JAMES KERR, Clerk.

SUBSTITUTE PROPOSED BY THE COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

Resolution of inquiry concerning the management of the World's Fair and expenditures therefor.

Whereas Congress by act approved April 25, 1890, provided for holding an International Exposition of the progress made in civilization at the city of Chicago in 1893, to commemorate the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Columbus; and

Whereas the act designating Chicago as the site of said Exposition required the people of that city to provide a suitable site and ten millons of dollars to complete the appropriation for holding said Exposition; and

Whereas in response to the requirements of said act the citizens of Chicago have furnished a site and provided over ten millions of dollars, a sum deemed adequate by Congress; and

Whereas fifty-nine nations have accepted the invitation of the Government of the United States to be present and participate in said exposition, and fifty States and Territories of the Federal Union have indicated their intention to participate and have expressed their desire that said exhibition shall in all things be commensurate with the importance of the event to be celebrated, and be worthy of the wealth and character of the United States; and

Whereas the Government has absolutely appropriated the sum of $1,088,000, and estimates are now before the Committee on Appropriations asking for further appropriations: therefore, in order that Congress may be fully advised as to the scope and plan adopted by those having jurisdiction and management of said Exposition, and also concerning the progress made, the amount of money expended, the manner of such expenditures, and the necessity therefor, together with such further information concerning the amount available for said work, and the sum that may become necessary to complete the same, and prepare the exposition for opening its gates to visitors:

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations is hereby ordered to inquire and report to this House whether those obligated and undertaking, and now engaged to do so, have justly and properly complied with the requirements of the said act of Congress approved April 25, 1890, and whether all expenditures of whatever character for said exposition have been judiciously made; whether the number of employés and appointees to carry out and into effect the laws is excessive and their compensation reasonable or otherwise, and to ascertain and report the salary or compensation paid to each officer and employé, from what States the several appointments have been made, and generally whether, in the care and conduct of said Exposition, proper management has been had; that they obtain a full report of those in charge of the expenditure of money, of all such expenditures, together with copies of the monthly pay rolls of all officers and appointees, and that the report of the committee, based upon said inquiry, may be made at any time to Congress, but at the earliest day possible consistent with the necessities of the inquiries involved in this resolution; and that the expenses of the committee or of any subcommittee it may designate to prosecute these inquiries and examinations shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, and the chairman of said committee or of such subcommittee, if one be designated, is authorized to draw for the same on the Clerk of the House in sums not to exceed $500 at any one time.

Mr. DURBOROW. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the substitute offered by the Committee on the Columbian Exposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has the floor.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that this resolution and the substitute be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. To what substitute does the gentleman refer?

Mr. SAYERS. The substitute reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the substitute for the original resolution reported by the Committee on Appropriations be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, if the House will give me its attention, I desire to explain in a very few words the nature of this resolution.

Under the original act, which provides for the holding of a World's Fair, the limit of appropriation for a Government exhibit was $1,500,000. The appropriation for that purpose to date amounts to $1,088,000; the balance still to be appropriated is $412,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it will be borne in mind by the House, that this appropriation is simply for a Governmental exhibit, and nothing else. Since the organization of the Committee on Appropriations of the present House, in the hearings on the sundry civil appropriation bill, it has been discovered that a part of the appropriation of $40,000, which was designated for the current expenses of the Life-Saving Service, has been or is sought to be diverted, under a ruling of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the building of a life-saving station, to be used in connection with the Government exhibit at the World's Fair.

Thus, you see, if that be permitted, instead of the appropriation being confined to $1,500,000, a sum equal to at least $25,000 will be taken from the annual current appropriation for the Life-Saving Service—a thing not contemplated by Congress when the World's Fair act was passed. It is not going too far to say that it is generally understood that the World's Fair Association will apply to this Congress either for a loan or for a direct appropriation amounting to near $5,000,000, or for an investment in the stock of the association to that amount.

Mr. REILLY. Before the gentleman leaves the point of the Life-Saving Service, I desire to inquire whether he is aware and takes into consideration the fact that the original bill of April 25, 1890, authorizes the construction of a life-saving station at the Columbian Exposition?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not understand that the original act authorizes the use of moneys outside of the direct appropriation for the governmental exhibit. I do not believe that it was the intention of Congress when the act was passed to allow any expenditure of money except that which was specified in the act itself and for the purposes named in the act.

Returning to the point which I was going to make when interrupted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will say that it is understood, from statements in the public press and from the conversation of gentlemen who have visited Washington in the interest of the Exposition, that an application will be made to Congress either for a loan of $5,000,000 or thereabouts, or for a direct appropriation of that amount, or for the investment of such a sum in stock to be held by the Government.

When the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] introduced his resolution early in the present session it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that committee came to the conclusion that, inasmuch as this proposition would probably be before Congress, it would be well for Congress to have full information touching the expenditures made by the Exposition, whether under that portion of the act which refers to governmental exhibits or otherwise.

Therefore the substitute which is reported by the committee provides for a thorough examination into all the expenditures of the Exposition, whether for the governmental exhibit or for other purposes. This is the proposition involved in this resolution. With this statement, Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], the author of the original resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has consumed ten minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words first as to the purpose I had in introducing that resolution into this House. I refer to that point because, in the public prints and in other quarters, some effort has been made to make it appear that the resolution was unfriendly in spirit and purpose toward that great Exposition. From the commencement of the discussion of this great Centennial Exposition I have been an earnest and outspoken supporter of the enterprise, and have never swerved from my fidelity to its interests.

But I have heard many reports and rumors, and have read statements in the press which, if they were true, would have a tendency to prejudice the public mind in regard to it. My desire in introducing this resolution was to recite briefly the object of the Exposition and what had been accomplished in connection with it by that wonderful city of cities, Chicago; and further, to elicit such full and complete information as would enable Congress to act intelligently in making any further appropriations that might be required.

In the original act there was a limit fixed of a million and a half. As stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] in charge of the resolution, $1,088,000 was appropriated. That leaves now something over $400,000 still to be appropriated under that limit. The Book of Estimates before the Committee on Appropriations contains items which we are asked to appropriate, and in the President's hands there are, I understand, further estimates under this $400,000 balance, which are still to come before us.

Under the original act of April 25, 1890, there was appropriated: For admission of foreign goods, $20,000; for Government building, $100,000; for care and transportation of Government exhibits, etc., $200,000. In the last sundry civil act, which was approved March 3, 1891, having passed at the second session of the last Congress, there was reported by the Committee on Appropriations and appropriated: For the completion of the Government building, $300,000; for care, etc., of Government exhibits, $350,000; for expenses of commission, $95,500; for admission of foreign exhibits, $20,000; for contingent expenses of the World's Congress Auxiliary, $2,500.

Mr. Speaker, after the introduction of this resolution and its reference to the Committee on Appropriations, which was an eminently proper reference, for that committee has jurisdiction of the appropriations for this purpose; it exercised that jurisdiction in the last Congress and the matter is before that Committee in this Congress also. After the introduction of that resolution by me some one introduced a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury for information on this subject. That is one good result of the introduction of the resolution proposed by me.

Mr. REILLY. If the gentleman will permit me I will say to him that that resolution to which he refers was offered by myself by authority of the Committee on the Columbian Exposition.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Very good. I was not familiar with the details. I understood, before the resolution was introduced, that that committee were going to take some action on the subject, and they have done so, and no one has objected, certainly I have not. We have here, in consequence of that call, a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, which has developed facts which I think it was important for the country to know. It specifies the expenditures of the money which has been appropriated, showing the payment of salaries running from $15,000 per annum, the salary of the director-general, down to $2,000 and $2,500 for clerks and others. In the last Congress the tremendous appropriations made for salaries of officers of the United States Commission were, as I remember it, cut down about one-half, with the exception of the salary of the director-general, which still remains at $15,000. This information in itself is, I think, valuable.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the country will not sustain us in making appropriations for this great enterprise, either under the million and a half limit or otherwise, unless we act with wisdom and with patriotism in regard to it. Now, I want to call the attention of the House, while on this subject of salaries, to the salaries that are paid in this country in a few instances. The President of the United States gets $50,000, and the next highest salary paid in this country is that of the director-general of the World's Fair, $15,000. In other words, this director-general ranks next in salary to the President. The Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States gets only $10,500; the justices of the Supreme Court, $10,000; the Vice-President of the United States, $8,000; the distinguished gentleman who presides over our deliberations, $8,000; the Cabinet officers, $8,000; the members of the Interstate Commission, $7,500; circuit judges, $6,000; the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the Director of the Geological Survey, the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, each, $6,000; the chief clerks of the War, State, and Navy Departments, $2,750 each; the Secretary of this World's Fair Commission, however, I see got $10,000, and the president of the commission, $12,000. This was cut in two after the storm of a year or more ago.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Very gladly.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Will the gentleman be so kind as to state what our minister to the court of St. James gets?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I am discussing officers here in this country. I think our minister to the court of St. James gets $17,000, though I do not speak by the card.

Mr. DOCKERY. Seventeen thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Every one knows that that compensation leaves the minister out of pocket, and that no foreign service on earth is so poorly paid as the foreign service of the United States Government. That opens up another field of discussion. I am limiting my remarks to salaried officers in this country. But the poor salaries to our foreign service ought to admonish us of the spirit of this country.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Very gladly.

Mr. HOPKINS. When the gentleman refers to the salaries of Federal judges, does he understand that those are life positions, and that those judges, after serving ten years and reaching the age of 70 years, can retire and continue to draw their salaries without rendering any service——

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I understand that.

Mr. HOPKINS. And that the offices now under consideration are temporary in their character, taking men from their ordinary pursuits and breaking up their regular business——

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Yes, I know that.

Mr. HOPKINS. And that of necessity——

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. The gentleman must not make a speech in my time; he can take his own time. Every schoolboy knows what the gentleman is calling my attention to.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. If every schoolboy knows it, it would be wise for the gentleman to adopt some other illustration.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I think I have used a good illustration; but I gave several others, if the gentleman had listened to me.

Mr. TAYLOR of Illinois rose.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Now if Illinois will hear me patiently——

Mr. TAYLOR of Illinois. I know that the gentleman desires to be correct.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Certainly I wish to be.

Mr. TAYLOR of Illinois. The gentleman has referred to the secretary of this commission as receiving a salary of $10,000; in fact he draws only $5,000.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I am aware that the salary was reduced to $5,000 by the last Congress.

Mr. TAYLOR of Illinois. These salaries were reduced by the board themselves, not by Congress at all.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. It was done in pursuance of the Candler investigation.

Mr. TAYLOR of Illinois. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that the reduction was not made by Congress, but by the board.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. But it was after a committee had reported upon the matter, and the board were forced to do it. Public sentiment, like the waves of the ocean, drove them to the shore of reduction. But when appointed they took hold of that $1,500,000 as though it had been a private fund intended for their own benefit. If you gentlemen want to have plain talk we will have it.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Now I do not understand that this is a question of "plain talk" or of ornamental talk, but a question of what is right.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. That is exactly what I am trying to get at.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I trust that the gentleman from Iowa, because he has been interrupted, will not allow his blood to course more rapidly in his veins, and reach a degree of excitement where he will do injustice to those affected by the resolution.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. My blood never flowed more pleasantly than now; and my head is clear as to the meaning of this issue. The blood of the blond gentleman from Illinois is a little excited, I fear. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I merely say that for one I do not propose to stand before the country to make such appropriations. Members of this House receive a salary of $5,000; United States Senators receive the same amount. You go before your people every two years. This commission is to continue, if I remember correctly, until 1898. This director-general was glad to fight, at no light expense, hard to get a two-year seat in this House at $5,000 salary. Has he so suddenly expanded in intellectual powers that no less than $15,000 will satisfy him, when he does not even have to bear the current and legitimate expenses of an election? Many of us served beside him here in Congress. He was a good man and an able man; but I remember nothing for which he was conspicuous except for his dead silence on most public questions. If you can vindicate a $15,000 salary for him, every gentleman on this floor is entitled to $25,000 salary. [Laughter and applause.] That is what I think about it. But let us have no misunderstanding; let there be no confusion——

Mr. TAYLOR of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this discussion is uncalled for. I do not know a man on this floor who is opposed to this resolution, I do not believe there is one. The dragging in of these matters without a chance for any defense seems to me unnecessary and uncalled for.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Why, Mr. Speaker, there will be plenty of opportunity for any gentleman who may wish to be heard in defense of this matter. I am giving my reasons for supporting this resolution. I will say to my friend from Illinois that there is a substitute pending here which seems to discredit the Committee on Appropriations as the proper committee to make the investigation. Now I say this, that on these immense expenditures we have a right to look these questions in the face and it is our duty to do so.

Mr. TAYLOR of Illinois. We all agree to that.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. And I caution this House and the friends of the Exposition, of which I am one, that if you are going to get further aid from the American Congress you have got to begin and cut where cutting is needed.

Now, let us have one thing understood, Mr. Speaker, for fear that we may make a mistake in comprehending the scope of this discussion. There are two bodies dealing with this Exposition. We have the United States Commission, provided for by the act of Congress, and we have the local Chicago corporation, which, I think, is called the "World's Exposition of 1892." That, I believe, is its corporate name. The latter body, I think, deserves all the praise that any man can voice with human speech for what they have accomplished; and I want no sentence or sentiment of mine to reflect in any manner or for an instant on that great body of men, who have raised over $10,000,000 for this enterprise, and, I understand, will raise, if necessary, from three to four millions of dollars more to make it a great success. They are deserving of all praise. That body of men and their work my resolution does not touch and does not seek to touch, unless they may voluntarily wish to give us information in regard to the Exposition. The aim, the scope, the sole purpose of the resolution is to go thoroughly into the investigation of such appropriations as have heretofore been made and are to be made by the Congress itself hereafter.

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, in regard to these two institutions or bodies we must keep in mind a clear distinction. We have a right to deal with the World's Commission; we have a right to pass upon the sufficiency of their salaries, or we can "turn off the fodder," so to speak. Understand, that under that law they (the Commission) had a right to fix the salaries of their officers, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, as I remember, and my aim and purpose is to get all the information we can possibly get in regard to these. The report from the Secretary of the Treasury, which is now in hand, states in itself that he is not able to go into all of these matters, that it will be too big a job.

Our friends who offer the substitute want this investigation to go into the hands of the Columbian Exposition Committee. Gentlemen, you have the five-million proposition coming before you. No one contests your prerogatives in investigating that or recommending the advisability of acceding to the request in the House. But we have the appropriations before us. These items belong to us; they are properly a part of the functions of our committee, and for one I feel that I should be quite as willing to have my friend, Brother HOLMAN of Indiana, run his "massive brain and eagle eye" over the items of expenditures of this Commission as I would be to have the chairman of the Columbian Exposition, my friend, Mr. DURBOROW, from Chicago. I think we would all feel just as well satisfied, and that one might do just as well as the other.

Now then, as my friend from Chicago, Col. TAYLOR thinks, as I understand him, nobody objects to an investigation. The great journals of Chicago have approved of it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Illinois. We not only approve of it, but we invite it.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. They have indorsed the resolution, but you do not want any investigation by the Committee on Appropriations. You have a substitute here, and when I take my seat gentlemen will be on their feet to fight for that substitute, which proposes to take this away from the Committee on Appropriations and give it to the Committee on the Columbian Exposition.

Mr. TAYLOR of Illinois. And I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that there are members right on this floor now from Chicago who will vote for that resolution.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Well, I always took you for a "thoroughbred," and the more I see of you the more I like you on that point. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Illinois. I do not say that I would vote for it myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Well, then, perhaps you had better let the other fellow talk who is going to vote for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Illinois. There are plenty of Chicago people who would not object to it.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Now, Mr. Speaker, my thought is simply this: That the "World's Columbian Exposition" should look——

Mr. McKENNA. Let me interrupt the gentleman a moment.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. McKENNA. In order to avoid any confusion—I do not think my friend from Iowa has expressed himself as clearly as usual. To avoid any confusion as to the demarcation or jurisdiction of these two commissions of which he is speaking, and which one he proposes to investigate, I hope he will inform us a little more explicitly. The gentleman has paid a very high tribute to the Chicago corporation. He does not touch or criticise that, but has referred to some salaries paid by them. I wish that my friend from Iowa would make clear exactly the point that he is seeking to accomplish in this investigation.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I thought I had made it clear.

Mr. McKENNA. Not as clear as usual.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I am never as clear, nor can I hope to be as clear, as my friend from California in any statement. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKENNA. I can not agree to that statement.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Because he is one of the clearest men on the floor, as well as one of the most gentlemanly of Representatives. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKENNA. Thank you.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. My theory of this proposition is just this: That this Committee on Appropriations is the only committee having jurisdiction over the proceedings of the World's Fair Commission. That is my theory; and that we do not seek through this investigation to reach the operations of the local corporation at all. That is the purpose and scope of this resolution. If these gentlemen, as they have said to me, want to give us information on the whole matter, and I believe they will—I believe the local corporation will be glad to do so if we want them to—while I see no objection to it, yet that is not the scope and aim of this resolution.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. How are these salaries you speak of fixed? What power fixes them?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. They are fixed by the Commission, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, under the act, as I remember. I referred to that a few moments ago.

Mr. COX of Tennessee. And the local corporation has nothing to do with that?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. The local corporation has nothing to do with that. That act does not so apply to them, but only to the other. But I wish to say—I have been switched off two or three times from my line of talk, but the switch was always an appropriate one—that I feel that this House, that the Congress, and the country will be better satisfied with all these investigations, if the Committee on the Columbian Exposition pursues its own proper investigations in the line of the proposed $5,000,000 legislation, which will certainly go to that committee, and if the Committee on Appropriations, of which the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is chairman, to which this other resolution of investigation was referred, as to the half million or less that we still have to appropriate, be permitted to conduct this investigation. That is my judgment upon it, and as my time is limited I will not occupy the attention of the House any longer at present.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Can not the gentleman give me a little time?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] is recognized.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. You will have an hour on the other side, if you are opposed to this resolution.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I intend to vote for your resolution.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that this debate may be extended until 4 o'clock, at which time a vote be taken upon the resolution, the substitute, and all amendments that may be offered.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] to ask that this question be considered until 4 o'clock, and then that there be a vote.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCREARY. Upon the proposition submitted by the Committee on Appropriations, as well as the proposition submitted by the Committee on the Columbian Exposition?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands it.

Mr. REILLY. And all pending amendments.

Mr. McCREARY. All amendments that may be pending at that time. I am in favor of that, but I want to have it understood that the substitute reported by the Committee on the Columbian Exposition shall also be considered.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBOROW] if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] yields the floor. The Chair will first submit the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. McKENNA. How is the time to be divided?

Mr. McCREARY. I think the time ought to be equally divided.

Mr. SAYERS. I will attend to that.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of any agreement the Chair proposed to recognize gentlemen in such a way as to divide the time equally. The Chair will be very glad if an arrangement can be made about it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask in that connection that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYRES] be allowed to control the time on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, and that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBOROW] be allowed to control the time on the other side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that that would allow an hour and a half on a side.

Mr. McCREARY. I want to state here—because it has not yet been stated—that this is not a fight between those who are in favor of $5,000,000 as a donation or a loan to the World's Fair and those who are against it. The struggle here is between the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on the Columbian Exposition as to the right of jurisdiction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will submit the request for unanimous consent. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] asks unanimous consent that the consideration of this bill shall continue before the House till 4 o'clock, at which hour a vote be taken, and that the time, from the beginning of the debate, be equally divided; that the substitute offered by the Committee on the Columbian Exposition be considered as pending, and also any other amendments that may be submitted in order; the vote to be taken at 4 o'clock. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBOROW] can go ahead.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] has consumed thirty-seven minutes of his time.

Mr. SAYERS. That is including the time used by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas yield the floor?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBOROW], chairman of the Committee on the World's Columbian Exposition.

Mr. DURBOROW. I desire to take up and have read the substitute that was offered on Friday by the Committee on the Columbian Exposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa offers a substitute for the resolution submitted by the Committee on Appropriations, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Congress, by an act approved April 25, 1890, provided "for celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus by holding an international exhibition of arts, industries, manufactures, and products of the soil, mine, and sea, in the city of Chicago, in the State of Illinois;"

Whereas, according to the requirements of said act, the citizens of Chicago have furnished a site and provided about $10,000,000 in aid of said international exhibition;

Whereas thirty-nine nations and twenty-four colonies have accepted the invitation of the Government of the United States to be present and participate in said exhibition, and their appropriations made or officially proposed, amount to $4,004,505, and twenty-six States and two Territories have made appropriations for representation at the exhibition, amounting to $2,695,000, and the Government of the United States has appropriated the sum of $1,088,000 and directed the Secretary of the Treasury to cause a suitable building to be erected on the site selected for the World's Columbian Exposition, for the purpose of exhibiting from its Executive Departments, the Smithsonian Institution, the United States Fish Commission, and the National Museum such articles and materials as illustrate the function and administrative faculty of the Government in time of peace and its resources as a war power and which tend to demonstrate the nature of our institutions and their adaptations to the wants of the people; and

Whereas officers of the World's Columbian Exposition have been before the Committee on the Columbian Exposition asking for further appropriations: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on the Columbian Exposition is hereby ordered to ascertain and report whether the said act of Congress, approved April 25, 1890, is being complied with, and whether subsequent appropriations made for said Exposition are being judiciously expended, and whether the officers and employés are being properly and reasonably paid, and what amount of money has been expended by the United States Government, and the manner and necessity of such expenditure, and what additional amount, if any, is necessary to be expended, and what further legislation, if any, is necessary, and all other facts that may conduce to the protection and benefit of the Government of the United States and the success of the Columbian Exposition; and in order to make such report the committee is authorized to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and to present its report to the House of Representatives for consideration at any time.

The SPEAKER. Before the gentleman proceeds, the Chair was not clear as to the understanding arrived at concerning the control of the time. If there be no objection the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] to control the time in favor of the view presented by the Committee on Appropriations, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBOROW] to control the time to be used by the Committee on the Columbian Exposition. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DURBOROW. Mr. Speaker, the resolution which was presented by the Committee on Appropriations was, as you have heard, offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] on the 5th of January, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. Unfortunately, I was not present in the House on that day. Had I been, I should have objected to its reference to that committee, and have endeavored to have the resolution referred to the Committee on the Columbian Exposition, where, in my opinion, it properly belongs. I waited for a couple of weeks to see what action the Committee on Appropriations would take on the subject. It not appearing that they had taken any action, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY] presented a resolution of very similar purport (that which has just been read), which was referred to the Committee on the Columbian Exposition. At their subsequent meeting this committee instructed me to report it to the House, and offer it as a substitute to the report of the Committee on Appropriations when that report should be brought in. This substitute, therefore, comes before the House in this way.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I most heartily and fully agree with what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] have said in regard to the necessity of an investigation. I believe that I am perhaps better posted on the affairs of the Columbian Exposition than any other member of this House; and I want to say that I am not prepared to-day to vote for any appropriation of money or any other assistance whatever until more information is given to this House than we at present have before us. I am heartily in favor of an investigation, and I want to see the investigation started as soon as possible.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question there?

Mr. DURBOROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAYERS. Suppose that an investigation should show that there has been no misuse of power or misappropriation of money by the World's Fair people, would you support an appropriation of $5,000,000, either as a loan, as an investment, or as a gift to the World's Fair?

Mr. DURBOROW. Suppose it should be shown that there was no misappropriation of money?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DURBOROW. Certainly I would. I am very much in favor of it.

Mr. McKENNA We can not hear what the gentleman has said.

Mr. DURBOROW. I do not care, I believe, to be interrupted in this manner.

Mr. SAYERS. I understand the gentleman to say that——

Mr. DURBOROW. I decline to yield.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order.

Mr. DURBOROW. The question is before the House, therefore, in this manner. It is not a question of an investigation, but it is a question of the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Columbian Exposition; and that is the subject to which I desire to address myself. I am as clearly in favor of an investigation as the gentlemen who have just had the floor.

I wish to cite the precedent of the last Congress, or previous Congresses, on the matter. The subject of the Columbian Exposition was first brought before the Fiftieth Congress in the matter of having a number of petitions presented to Congress favoring the holding of this fair.

No action was taken, if I understand it correctly, until the Fifty-first Congress, when a very large number of petitions were presented and referred to certain committees, and a conflict of jurisdiction came up. But, to settle this conflict of jurisdiction, the House authorized the appointment of a Special Committee on the Quadro-Centennial. This committee was afterwards appointed and given jurisdiction in the following terms:

That all proposed legislation referring to the quadro-centennial shall be referred to the Select Committee on the Quadro-Centennial.

This committee exercised that power, Mr. Speaker, by considering all legislation on that subject. It considered and reported the act of April 25, 1890, which is now the law. It reported that act to the House, and that act carried with it an appropriation of one million and a half, I believe. At any rate, the act was considered and reported by the Committee on the Quadro-Centennial. At the beginning of this Congress the Committee on Rules reported among its select committees a Committee on the Quadro-Centennial. The name of this committee was afterwards changed to the "Committee on the Columbian Exposition," for the reason that the corporate authorities in charge of the Exposition had changed the name of their corporation, and it is now known as the "World's Columbian Exposition Corporation."

In the RECORD of January 6, the present session, the Committee on Rules reported a rule prescribing the jurisdiction of the regular committees, and proposing that the regular committees should be governed by Rule XI of the Rules of the Fiftieth Congress. Paragraph 3 of that rule, in relation to the Committee on Appropriations, provides that questions relating—to appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government as herein provided, viz: for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses; for sundry civil expenses; for fortifications and coast defenses; for the District of Columbia; for pensions, and for all deficiencies [shall be referred] to the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we maintain that legislation or appropriations relating to the World's Columbian Exposition do not come under any power which, by that rule, is delegated to the Committee on Appropriations. On the other hand, on the 6th of January last, the Committee on Rules reported a rule governing the jurisdiction of the select committees of this House in which it is provided that—

All proposed legislation concerning the Columbian Exposition shall be referred to the Committee on the Columbian Exposition.

There are no limitations in that rule. Under it all legislation of whatever character relating to the World's Fair, whether it includes appropriations or no, is to be referred to the Committee on the Columbian Exposition. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Columbian Exposition have not brought up this question because of any objection to the proposed investigation, because we are a unit as to the necessity of having an investigation. The entire subject should be investigated, and I am authorized by the officials of the World's Fair at Chicago to state that they desire an investigation of the most complete character, and will offer every facility in their power to the committee that shall be appointed by this House to make that investigation.

But the Committee on the Columbian Exposition believe and maintain that the jurisdiction conferred upon them in relation to this subject gives them the right and the power to attend to all legislation in relation to the Exposition, and, as a consequence of that belief they have presented this substitute to the House for adoption. I will ask the Chair how much time I have consumed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has consumed seventeen minutes.

Mr. DURBOROW. I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY].

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Speaker, before I commence I would like to have a further agreement about time. There was one hour consumed before we agreed upon two hours' debate, and I take it that we shall be allowed our part of the time, taking into consideration what was consumed by members of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I understood that the time from the beginning of the morning hour until 4 o'clock was to be equally divided.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Speaker of the House stated that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] had consumed thirty-seven minutes, and that that time would be charged up in the total time allowed for debate.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Speaker, I have been in favor of celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America ever since that subject was presented to Congress. I believe that an international exposition or world's fair, participated in by all the nations of the earth, is the best way to emphasize and commemorate the greatest event of the kind that ever occurred in this world, and I stood here upon this floor less than two years ago and advocated the World's Fair, and advocated its being located at Chicago.

Preparations are being made to-day in the city of Chicago for a grand pageant of civilization, a splendid picture of progress and prosperity, a great display of the arts, industries, products, minerals, and manufactures of all nations, and, so far as I know, everything at the great city is moving along in a way which shows that the people of Chicago appreciate the responsibility that rests upon them and the great occasion that is soon to come. I say this much in order that my position may be understood; and I desire to say further that the history of the world does not present another such instance as that we now have in Chicago, where a city furnishes a site for a world's fair and raises $10,000,000 to pay the expense of the fair.

The first international exposition was held in London in 1851. The cost of this exposition was less than $1,000,000.

The next international exposition was held in New York in 1853, and the cost of the buildings, added to other expenditures, amounted to $640,000.

In 1855 the Emperor Napoleon declared the Universal Exposition opened at Paris.

The total cost of the exposition was $2,257,000, or, including the cost of the Palais d'Industrie, which was met by the French Government, $5,000,000.

The next great international exposition was held in London in 1862. The cost of buildings and of the entire exhibition, including all expenses, was $2,300,000.

The Paris Exposition of 1867 ranks among the most magnificent and successful expositions ever attempted. The receipts were $2,103,675, but the expenses were kept secret by the Government.

The Vienna International Exposition of 1873 was one of the grandest expositions ever held. It cost about $6,000,000.

The Centennial Exhibition, at Philadelphia, was the greatest ever held up to 1876. The total amount collected was $3,813,726, but it is said the cost of the Exposition was a little more than this amount.

Thus it appears that the citizens of Chicago have raised nearly double the amount heretofore expended in paying expenses of other international expositions.

The real question now under consideration is, whether we will adopt the resolution reported by the Committee on Appropriations, or whether you will adopt the resolution reported by the Committee on the Columbian Exposition. I have great respect for the Committee on Appropriations of this House, and I desire to call the attention of members to the vast responsibilities that are resting upon that committee. At an early day in this session, when the House of Representatives had not adopted rules for its government, my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] introduced a resolution authorizing an investigation of the World's Fair.

We are informed by those connected with the World's Fair that they do not shrink from an investigation. I have never heard anything against those men, except I believe those who have charge of that World's Fair are now trying to make it the greatest, the grandest, the most magnificent exposition ever held in the world. They do not object to an investigation. The distinguished gentleman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa] introduced his resolution directing an investigation to be made, and had it referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MCCREARY. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. My original resolution did not provide what committee should do the work.

Mr. MCCREARY. But you referred your resolution to the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. It was referred by the Speaker to the Committee on Appropriations, and the substitute reported names the Committee on Appropriations and gives it greater power than I proposed in my original resolution.

Mr. MCCREARY. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], who is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, offered that resolution, and it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Now, the Committee on Appropriations reports a resolution authorizing the Committee on Appropriations to make the investigation.

Mr. Speaker, I have great respect for that committee. Beginning with the chairman, Judge HOLMAN, and going through its membership, it is composed of many of the best members in this Congress. But I do not desire to overburden that committee. The Committee on Appropriations has already six great appropriation bills to consider and prepare. Recently our code of rules in this House added to the responsibilities of that committee by giving them the power to report general legislation on their appropriation bills and to reduce salaries. In addition to what I have stated, the distinguished chairman of that committee brought in resolutions, which were adopted defining the position of the majority of this House on economy, retrenchment, and reform.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa (to Mr. MCCREARY). Did you not vote for them?

Mr. MCCREARY. I did; and I wish you had voted for them.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I did vote for a part of them.

Mr. MCCREARY. The proposition was not in accordance with the way your party acted in the last Congress, and therefore you voted against it.

Mr. MCKENNA. I hope the gentleman will not be partisan!

Mr. MCCREARY. I was speaking of the responsibilities of the members of the Committee on Appropriations when I was interrupted. They have the six appropriation bills. They have been intrusted with authority to place new legislation on the appropriation bills. The chairman of the committee has reported resolutions, which were adopted, defining the position of the majority in this House on the subject of economy, retrenchment, and reform. Now they are not satisfied with their power, but must have more. They seek to be authorized to investigate the World's Fair.

Mr. Speaker, there are three committees of this House that have as much right to make this investigation as the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, because that committee is specially authorized to consider matters relating to buildings erected by the Government, and nearly a half million of dollars have been expended in erecting a building for Government exhibits at the World's Fair. The Committee on Foreign Affairs, because thirty-nine of the great nations of the world have made arrangements to be represented there, and have already expended millions of dollars in erecting buildings. And last, but not least, there is a select committee appointed by the Speaker of this House to look into matters connected with the World's Fair—the committee known as the Committee on the Columbian Exposition. This resolution, providing for an investigation, should have been referred to the Committee on the Columbian Exposition because that Committee, under the rules, is specially charged with matters connected with the Columbian Exposition.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] has very kindly said that after a while when the officers of the World's Fair ask a donation or a loan the bill will be referred to the Committee on the Columbian Exposition. I expect the Committee on Appropriations will desire control of that bill also.

I do not wish to be misunderstood in this connection when I am talking about donations for the benefit of the World's Fair. Congress has already appropriated a little over $1,000,000 to pay the expenses connected with the Government exhibits and for the erection of a public building at Chicago. I am in favor, Mr. Speaker, of holding the distinguished representatives from Illinois to the position they took in this House when they were asking us to locate the World's Fair at Chicago. I remember when my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] said:

Give us the World's Fair at Chicago. We will ask nothing from Congress except what will be required for the building and the Government exhibits. I suppose five or six hundred thousand dollars will be enough to provide for the Government exhibits.

The distinguished representative at that time on the Republican side, Mr. Mason, said practically the same thing. I desire to hold these gentlemen to that position. I said on this floor myself, in advocating Chicago as the proper location for the World's Fair, that I was willing to vote a sufficient amount of money for Government exhibits and for the erection of proper buildings by the United States in which to display these exhibits, but that I was unwilling to give another dollar. I have not changed my mind on this question. The people of Chicago and of Illinois have embarked in a great enterprise—one of the grandest the world has ever seen. I am not in favor of interrupting them in their great work. Let them go on with it. They have raised $10,000,000—nearly twice as much as was ever expended on any other world's fair; and I see no reason why that amount together with what the Government has given for the purpose of erecting buildings and for securing a proper display of Government exhibits will not be sufficient.

I come now to the resolution offered by the Committee on Appropriations and the substitute submitted by the Committee on the Columbian Exposition. I do not believe that the resolution as framed by the Committee on Appropriations is framed in the proper way, and I call attention to its language. The Committee on Appropriations very properly propose to direct a subcommittee to be appointed by its chairman to inquire and to report to this House.

To inquire and report to this House whether those obligated and undertaking, and now engaged to do so, have justly and properly complied with the requirements of the said act of Congress approved April 25, 1890.

That is very good.

And whether all expenditures of whatever character for said Exposition have been judiciously made; whether the number of employés and appointees to carry out and into effect the laws is excessive and their compensation reasonable or otherwise; and to ascertain and report the salary or compensation paid to each officer and employé, from what State the several appointments have been made, etc.

Then, Mr. Speaker, they authorize the chairman of the subcommittee to draw $500 at any time when it seems to be proper for him to do so for the purpose of carrying on the inquiry. That is substantially what the Committee on Appropriations recommend in their resolution. I do not believe that that resolution is as full as it should be. The substitue authorized by the Committee on the Columbian Exposition and offered by the chairman, Mr. DURBOROW, provides:

That the Committee on the Columbian Exposition is hereby ordered to ascertain and report whether the said act of Congress approved April 25, 1890, is being complied with, and whether subsequent appropriations made for said Exposition are being judiciously expended, and whether the officers and employés are being properly and reasonably paid, and what amount of money has been expended by the United States Government.

No man knows to-day exactly what amount has been expended under the act of April 25, 1890. It also provides for ascertaining—the manner and necessity of such expenditure and what additional amount, if any, is necessary, and all other facts that may conduce to the protection and benefit of the Government of the United States and the success of the Columbian Exposition.

I believe that that select committee should inquire what further legislation is necessary if any. I believe that that committee should inquire how the money has been expended that has been expended up to this time out of the Treasury of the United States, and I believe the committee should ascertain and report what amount if any is necessary to have our Government exhibits properly displayed, but nothing further.

At the last session of Congress the Committee on the World's Fair appointed a subcommittee which investigated matters connected with the World's Fair, and made a report to this House, and I believe the Committee on the Columbian Exposition, which has the same jurisdiction, should make the investigation at this session.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. SAYERS. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE].

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I do not belong to either of the contending committees, but I wish to express briefly my views as to which of the two should, in my judgment, make the proposed investigation.

The question of jurisdiction is raised in these resolutions, and the consideration of them, as to which of the two committees shall have authority to report any appropriations that Congress may choose to make for this exposition. To my mind it is not at all clear that the Committee on the Columbian Exposition should have any such power and authority under the rules giving them jurisdiction upon such subjects on which they may report under the rules.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY], who has just closed, has called the attention of the House to the fact that some of the members on this floor representing the great city of Chicago at the time this subject was under consideration in the Fifty-first Congress, expressed themselves as not intending to ask for any subsequent appropriation from the United States Treasury. Such an expression was general; it was so understood by this House; it was accepted by all of those who favored the location at Chicago, of which number I was one.

During the discussion of that question in the House a member from the city of Chicago then, Mr. Lawler, said:

We will accept this bill, and live up to it—when the question was asked whether they would come back for another appropriation in the future. Mr. Mason, another representative from the city of Chicago, said:

All we ask is that this House will give us the bill which the committee has reported. We will comply with the terms on the part of Congress, and endeavor to make it a success.

But now the proposition is urged that further appropriations should be granted. These two resolutions have come in for our consideration because of the pendency of that proposition.

Both sides, both committees, agree that an investigation should be had. The scope of the resolutions authorizing the investigation should be considered, and that will enable us, perhaps, to determine which of the two committees desires to make the more thorough and searching investigation, and which of these two will push the investigation further and deeper. The resolution of the Committee on the Columbian Exposition has but three propositions that they propose to investigate:

Whether the said act of Congress, approved April 25, 1890, is being complied with.

Second—

Whether the subsequent appropriations made for said exposition are being judiciously expended, and whether the officers and employés are being properly and reasonably paid; what amount of money has been expended by the United States Government, and the manner of such expenditure; and

Third—

What further legislation, if any, is necessary; and all other facts that may conduce to the protection and benefit of the Government of the United States and the success of the Columbian Exposition.

While the resolution coming from the Committee on Appropriations goes further and deeper. First, they are to investigate—

Whether those delegated and undertaking and now engaged to do so have justly and properly complied with the requirements of said law of Congress; second, whether all expenditures of whatever character for said Exposition have been judiciously made; third, whether the number of employés and appointees to carry out and into effect the laws—

Not are properly paid as stated in the other resolution, but—whether their number is excessive, whether their compensation is reasonable or otherwise, and to ascertain and report the salary or compensation paid to each officer and employé and from what State the several appointments have been made.

Fourth—

Going beyond anything in the former resolution, and of more importance and wider scope—

Generally, whether in the care and conduct of said Exposition proper management has been had, and that they obtain a full report of those in charge of the expenditure of money, of all such expenditures, together with copies of the monthly pay rolls of all officers and appointees, and that the report of the committee based upon said inquiry may be made at any time to Congress, but at the earliest day possible.

One word more, and that is this, that this resolution reported from the Committee on Appropriations is certainly the better resolution, and that committee the better one to make the investigation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SAYERS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT].

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, the question at issue here is, which of two committees has proper jurisdiction over the subject-matter of this inquiry. It seems to me that this is the only point, and that it lies within a very narrow compass. In the last Congress a special committee was appointed to which was referred legislation looking to a world's fair or quadro-centennial exposition. Of that matter, when in that shape, the Appropriations Committee would have had no jurisdiction. It was deemed necessary and proper to form a new committee, which could consider that new subject-matter. That committee was formed, it performed its duty, made its report, and the Government entered upon the new enterprise, established rightfully, under the rules of this House, after a report had been made by this new committee. So a law was passed which authorized the Government to expend under a special act, approved April 25, 1890, the sum of $20,000 for the admission of foreign goods, $100,000 for a Government building, and $200,000 for the care and transportation of Government exhibits to be carried to this Exposition.

If there was anything at all irregular in that, it was that the Commission itself, which established this new enterprise, also appropriated money to begin it; but this is not uncommon.

Now that act was passed at the first session of the Fifty-first Congress. The law having been passed and expenditures authorized, then came the question, at the second session of that Congress, when it was proposed to continue those appropriations, what committee should have jurisdiction. That question was referred naturally and properly to the Committee on Appropriations, and at the second session of that Congress that committee, in the sundry civil bill, reported and Congress passed appropriations amounting to $670,000 to carry on this work.

All this was in accordance with the rules of this House, which in this respect were precisely the same in the last Congress as in this. I was very much astonished that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY], with all his experience here, should have said that the Committee on Public Buildings would have a better right to jurisdiction here than the Committee on Appropriations. Does not that gentleman know that the usual practice is for a public building to be authorized upon a report made from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and that after the building is authorized its construction becomes a lawful enterprise, upon which the Government has entered, and that after this the Appropriations Committee always continue the appropriation?

Mr. MCCREARY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HERBERT. Just for a question, nothing more.

Mr. MCCREARY. I agree with you in what you state. I have been in Congress for some time; this is my fourth term, and I have never known the Committee on Appropriations before to become an investigation committee. I said the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, or on Foreign Affairs, or on the Columbian Exposition, had as much right to make this investigation as the Committee on Appropriations had, and I still say so.

Mr. HERBERT. I will answer the gentleman before I get through. He admits that what I said was true, that according to rule, a public enterprise having been established by law, the jurisdiction is in the Committee on Appropriations to report all apropriations toward the completion of that enterprise.

And now, let me say right here that the rules under which these two laws were passed by the last Congress were precisely the same as now, identical with the rules read by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBOROW] that now exist.

But the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] rose to make a still more startling statement than he made before, when he said a moment ago that he had never known the Committee on Appropriations to be an investigating committee.

Why, sir, the precise object of this resolution is that this House shall have furnished to it, through some appropriate committee, information as to how the appropriations made heretofore are being expended, in order that we may properly judge as to what appropriations shall be made in the future.

Mr. MCCREARY. Only one moment.

Mr. HERBERT. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I want to answer this question before he asks me another.

Mr. MCCREARY. Very well.

Mr. HERBERT. Now, then, he never knew that the Appropriations Committee could rightfully be an investigating committee! Why, Mr. Speaker, when I left the room of the Committee on Naval Affairs this morning I dropped right there an investigation of the expenditure of money appropriated in the last Congress. Other committees having charge of appropriations call before them, as our committee did this morning, officials who have to do with the expenditure of the Government moneys. The committee questions the official to know why and how moneys are expended so that it can get information necessary to enable it to appropriate or withhold appropriations in the future. And I wish to know if the gentleman, when at the head of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the Fiftieth Congress, in considering appropriations to carry on that Department of the Government, did not himself make investigations precisely of that character?

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HERBERT. I do not require an answer at this time.

Mr. MCCREARY. I want to answer. I insist on replying. I have the right to reply.

Mr. HERBERT. You can not take my time for that purpose.

Mr. MCCREARY. I have got no time. I want to answer that question.

Mr. HERBERT. I do not yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama declines to yield.

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, that is precisely the business of every committee of this House that appropriates money—to inquire how the money which has been appropriated in the past has been expended, especially when Congress is about to be called upon for new appropriations in the same direction. Bills have already been introduced in this Congress to appropriate large sums of money for the purpose of carrying on this Exposition; and I say that, beyond all doubt, the Committee on Appropriations alone has jurisdiction under the rules of this House to investigate questions like this.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama asked me a question, and would not yield for a reply.

The SPEAKER. Does any gentleman yield time to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY]?

Mr. MCCREARY. I rise in my own time. I have three minutes remaining.

Mr. DURBOROW. I yielded twenty minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky, of which he used seventeen minutes, and reserved three minutes.

Mr. MCCREARY. I am speaking now in my own time, and I hope the Speaker will not count until I commence. [Laughter.]

My friend from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], who has been here longer than I have, but who does not seem to be very well posted on the work of the Committee on Appropriations, asks me if the Committee on Foreign Affairs did not sometimes look into appropriations; and he said that the Committee on Naval Affairs, of which he is chairman, this morning looked into appropriations. There are certain kinds of appropriations that his Committee on Naval Affairs and that the Committee on Foreign Affairs have a right to look into without any resolution on the subject. The members of the Committee on Appropriations knew they had no right or no authority to investigate the expenditures of money by the officers of the World's Fair until they were authorized so to do by the House of Representatives, and therefore the resolution was reported.

Mr. HERBERT arose.

Mr. MCCREARY. I will not let the gentleman from Alabama interrupt me, as he refused to let me interrupt him. [Laughter.]

Mr. HERBERT. They have just as much right as they ever had. They have got this power. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCCREARY. No, no; I will not allow the gentleman to interrupt me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky declines to yield, and the House will be in order.

Mr. MCCREARY. I desire to call the attention of my polite friend from Alabama to the jurisdiction given to the Committee on Appropriations by Rule XI. Rule XI, adopted by the action of the House, provides:

Subjects relating to appropriations of revenue for the support of the Government, as herein provided.

And then gives the names of the six appropriation bills of which the Appropriations Committee have jurisdiction. That is what the rule says about that committee. It does not give the committee power to investigate, but it gives the committee authority to report bills, to appropriate money for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses, for the sundry civil expenses, for fortifications and coast defense, for the District of Columbia, for pensions, and for all deficiencies. But it does not say that the committee shall have power to investigate the World's Fair. The rule authorizing the appointment of a Committee on the Columbian Exposition gives that committee jurisdiction of all matters relating to the Columbian Exposition. I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has consumed his time.

Mr. DURBUROW. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER].

Mr. DOLLIVER. I do not expect to occupy ten minutes. I heartily agree with everything that has been said by my colleague [Mr. HENDERSON] upon the necessity for an investigation of the World's Fair management. Whatever may have been the original necessity for such an inquiry, now that the question has been asked, it is certain that it should be answered without delay and without reservation, and I am gratified to know that the officials of the World's Fair agree heartily with the spirit which suggests a complete and thorough investigation of all that they have done. The only question here is, whether the investigation shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations or to the committee appropriately charged with that business under the rules of this House.

Now, to those of us who are familiar with the cheerful appetite with which the Committee on Appropriations has learned to eat up the business of this House, the reference of this resolution, by inadvertence, to that committee is not amazing, but to those of an inquiring disposition, those who look at the reason and the motive of things, the assignment of this resolution to a group of gentlemen whose business lies in a wholly different sphere, raises some very interesting, though possibly quite vain, questions. [Laughter.] The committee upon the World's Fair in the last Congress was an appropriation committee. It reported the law creating the national relation of the World's Fair enterprise, and I would like to know upon what theory or practice in this House a resolution relating to the management of the World's Fair has been referred to a committee the field of whose jurisdiction and operations is entirely different?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Will my colleague allow me an observation?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. In that very same Congress our committee reported appropriations for the World's Fair, as my colleague would have heard me state this morning if he had been listening. Furthermore, it was not by inadvertence that this resolution was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It was referred by the Speaker regularly, not by the House.

Mr. DOLLIVER. In the absence of the chairman of the World's Fair Committee, however. If this were a question of appropriations under the rules of this House, we could debate that, but it does not rise even to the dignity of a question of appropriations. It is a question whether an humble committee of this House shall have its jurisdiction taken away from it by a group of gentlemen whose occupations are already so vast and arduous as to have tired almost everybody in the House. [Laughter.] Now the Scriptures contemplate that we shall bear one another's burdens in this world, but I have never heard that precept interpreted to mean that we should steal one another's burdens. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. That is what you boys are trying to do.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Not at all. We simply want to keep our own.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. If the gentleman will permit me, I will suggest another passage of Scripture which may be applicable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Not for Scripture. [Laughter.]

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR. I remind the gentleman that the Scripture also says:

> For whosoever hath, to him shall be given, and he shall have more abundance: but whosoever hath not, from him shall be taken away even that he hath.

Mr. DOLLIVER. That precept of cold, worldly philosophy we seek to overrule. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, unless it is the purpose of this House to abolish the jurisdiction of the Committee on the World's Fair, I think the contention made by the chairman of that committee ought to be supported here. To be candid with the House, and especially with the humbler membership of the House that has very little connection with the business of this body, I say plainly that we on the Committee on the World's Fair do not wish to be left in the crypt of this Capitol with nothing to do but gaze at the portrait of Christopher Columbus which our chairman has hung upon the wall of the dungeon where we dwell. [Laughter.] Already we have to employ a guide to find our committee room, and we do not desire the House, by supporting the contention of the Committee on Appropriations, to leave us in a position where we shall have to employ a detective to find out our business. [Laughter and applause.] I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, this is a question of jurisdiction between two committees of this House, and in the absence of any clear and explicit rules defining to which committee this particular business should go, I want to direct the minds of members to one fact which will settle the question. Upon what basis were these two committees organized and for what purposes? The one, the Committee on the Columbian Exposition, was organized with special reference to friendship for the World's Fair at Chicago: upon that and upon no other ground.

Mr. MCCREARY. Did the gentleman hear what I said a moment ago, that while I am a friend to the World's Fair, I will not vote for a donation of $5,000,000?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes, sir. It is understood, Mr. Speaker, as I have already said, that the Committee on the Columbian Exposition is friendly to the Exposition and to its expenditures, while the other committee, the Committee on Appropriations, was organized with a special view to looking critically into the expenditures of the public money. We see the case illustrated every day in court, where a murder trial is coming on and where the attorneys, on the one hand, try to catch a jury that will be favorable to their client, while the prosecuting attorney, on the other side, makes every effort to get a jury that will condemn the culprit at the bar. In this case the practical question is simply this: The report that will come from the committee—will it be favorable to an extravagant expenditure of the people's money or not?

That is the issue in this House to-day, and I want to say to gentlemen here that if the adoption of the Holman resolutions meant anything at the time, if those resolutions are to continue to mean anything, and if we are not here to deceive our constituents about our purpose with regard to expenditures of the public money, then the House had better leave this matter in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations with HOLMAN at its head, for there is no question better settled than that that committee will take care of the public funds this session of Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the only question is whether or not this Commission has expended properly the public money which has been appropriated. They are now asking for a continued appropriation. The Committee on Appropriations must consider this part of the proposition; and I am very glad to know that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] has at last concluded that the Scripture rule is a good one—that we ought to bear one another's burdens. But I want to say to the gentleman and to other members of the House who take the other view of this question, that the Committee on Appropriations has not asked any one yet to bear its burdens. It may be that before the end of the session we shall ask the House in its clemency to divide our business with other committees; but up to this date we have regarded ourselves as perfectly competent, as we are willing, to transact the business which this House has put upon our shoulders.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RICHARDSON). To whom does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] now yield?

Mr. SAYERS. Let us hear from the other side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To whom does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBOROW] yield?

Mr. DURBOROW. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER].

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I have not had the pleasure of hearing all the addresses that have been made on this subject; but it has been my good fortune to hear a considerable portion of the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBOROW] and the speech of the gentleman who last addressed the House. This question, as I understand, is simply as to the committee to which this resolution of investigation ought to be referred. Now, by your rules (a good many of which I did not entirely approve and do not now approve, though I shall have to act under and live up to them)—according to your rules as adopted, all matters referring to the Columbian Exposition must be referred to the committee having that matter in charge.

It is insisted, however, that this proposition ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations; and one of the arguments urged is that the Committee on the Columbian Exposition may be regarded as favorable to the project. Are we to understand by this that the Committee on Appropriations is opposed to it? Why, sir, it is a settled fact that we are to have that Exposition. We have adopted legislation in relation to it. The location was not fixed exactly where I wanted it. There was a great contest between the city of New York and the city of Chicago as competitors for the site of this World's Fair. I preferred that it should be held at the national capital.

This Congress having determined that question, and determined it in favor of the city of Chicago, and there having been created in the last Congress a committee to take this special matter into consideration, why should a proposition of this kind be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, more particularly as the resolution does not affect, according to my understanding, the question of appropriation. I am advocating the reference to the Committee on the Columbian Exposition without regard to the question of what amount of money should be voted, or whether any should be voted.

This is a simple question of investigation. You have a committee upon this special subject. Why should the Committee on Appropriations undertake to claim that it is better qualified to discharge the duty here called for than the special committee already created by the House? I am not aware of any reason for such a position. The Committee on Appropriations has its function, which is to report appropriations to be paid out of the public Treasury. The committee by whom this investigation is to be made will be called upon to discharge a special function—to determine what has been done with the money already appropriated, and how many employés have been put into office by the Commission. Peculiarly, therefore, should this question go to the Committee on the Columbian Exposition, because it is a matter in reference to past transactions, not in regard to future appropriations.

I very well remember the occasion when we had presented to us the question of "robbing" (for that was the expression sometimes used) the Committee on Appropriations of its great and overgrown powers. That proposition was resisted by every gentleman connected with the Appropriations Committee, and it was insisted that the Committee on Appropriations should hold on to all the power that it had before exercised. The House, however, determined to make the division. The reform was first adopted with reference to the Committee on Agriculture, the House believing that the gentleman at the head of that committee and the members associated with him were better qualified to dispose of questions pertaining to that particular Department of the Government than was the Appropriations Committee. So, afterward, a number of other committees were clothed with similar power with reference to other great Departments of the Government. And these rules do not interfere with that.

Now you have created a special committee on the Columbian Exposition. Why should it not deal with questions pertaining to that subject—at least with regard to the expenditure of appropriations heretofore made? Is not this committee in a better position to make the investigation than the Appropriations Committee? Why, sir, when I look at the personnel of this Committee on the Columbian Exposition—when I look at the character of its members, whether belonging on one side of the House or the other—I can not but recognize that this subject has been intrusted to gentlemen amply capable of dealing with the question and of making a fair report to the House upon such a question as this—a simple question as to what has become of the money appropriated by Congress—how it has been dealt with by the authorities who have the Columbian Exposition in charge?

Peculiarly does it belong to that committee. Why should the Committee on Appropriations have it? It does not involve the question of appropriations—not a dollar, I understand. It is a preliminary inquiry looking, probably, to the appropriation of money hereafter, and I want to express no opinion upon that. But it is simply an investigation of the application of money heretofore appropriated; and to that extent it belongs exclusively to the committee having charge of that particular subject, namely, the Exposition at Chicago.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SAYERS. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT].

Mr. HERBERT. Mr. Speaker, when I was on the floor before I think I demonstrated the fact that it was the proper and legitimate duty of the Committee on Appropriations to investigate the expenditures of moneys heretofore reported by that committee. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] sought to obviate that point by asking, why then the necessity of a special resolution to authorize this investigation to be made? The answer is this, Mr. Speaker: Simply because this investigation is to be made in a distant city requiring a special power to enable the Committee on Appropriations, or any other committee, to make the investigation there. The resolution provides—as all such resolutions must provide—for the payment of the expenses necessarily incurred. So a special resolution would be necessary to enable the World's Fair Committee or any other committee to act. So much for that.

Now, then, as to what the resolutions are. I showed what was the practice under a former Congress, when the rules were precisely or substantially as they are to-day. Rule XI provides:

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule as follows, namely:

And here I take as a sample the Judiciary Committee—

Subjects relating to judicial proceedings, civil and criminal law: to the Committee on the Judiciary.

I use that as an illustration. No one can contend for a moment that this language gives the Committee on the Judiciary any power whatever over appropriations, although they might be for the expenses of courts. That committee can make laws relating to courts or establishing courts, but for the money to carry on those courts we must look to the Committee on Appropriations. The same words that give jurisdiction to the Judiciary Committee give also jurisdiction to the World's Fair Committee. That committee has jurisdiction over proposed legislation relating to the Exposition.

No committee ever has a right to make appropriations unless words conferring such jurisdiction are used specifically in the rule defining the powers of the committee. No committee has any power except as it derives it from the rules. So, then, the World's Fair Committee would have no right to consider the further question of appropriations at all. And every gentleman here knows that the purpose of this resolution is to obtain information to enable the House to act advisedly with reference to appropriation bills now pending or hereafter to be introduced into the House relating to this enterprise.

Mr. MCCREARY. I would like the gentleman to read from the resolution now under consideration anything that looks like appropriating money to the World's Fair.

Mr. HERBERT. I did not say that the resolution made an appropriation of money. I said that the resolution now pending would necessitate an expenditure of money which no committee would have the right to incur without some special authority given in a resolution like this. I said some such rule was necessary to give any committee jurisdiction to make an investigation in a distant city like that contemplated here. The rule establishing this special committee does not give it any power whatever over this question of appropriations; it was not so construed in the last Congress, and can not be properly so construed here.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DURBOROW. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. REILLY].

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what occasion there is, if any, for an investigation into the expenditures of the money heretofore appropriated to the World's Columbian Exposition. Neither do I propose to discuss that question now. Nor do I raise any question as to the right or power of this House to direct an investigation into that matter if it so decides. Nor, Mr. Speaker, do I question the right of the House, or its power, to have that investigation made in any manner and form and by any committee it pleases. The question that is now before the House is one which involves the jurisdiction of two separate committees.

So far as I am personally concerned, and speaking, I think, for my colleagues on the Committee on the Columbian Exposition, no one wants to antagonize in any manner any investigation that this House desires to have made in respect to the management of the Exposition up to this time. I have been curious, however, Mr. Speaker, to learn upon what theory and authority the Committee on Appropriations arrogates to itself the right to make this investigation. Since the subject of celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Columbus was first brought to the attention of Congress, in no manner and at no time has the House ever conferred upon the Appropriations Committee jurisdiction over the subject, nor has that committee had anything to do with the matter up to this time.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Will my friend allow me——

Mr. REILLY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. In the last Congress, as I read from the statement awhile ago, $700,000 were appropriated on the sundry civil bill; and that committee did not arrogate this to themselves. This resolution was referred in due process to that committee.

Mr. REILLY. I do not know about that. I infer that it was so referred on the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa, who introduced the resolution. Am I correct in that?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. The Speaker made the reference.

Mr. REILLY. But I infer that he made it at the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I said to the Speaker that the estimates were before the Committee on Appropriations, involving appropriations, and that in the last Congress they had made appropriations; upon which statement he promptly made the reference to that committee.

Mr. REILLY. I know that the resolution was referred, and

I supposed it was done in a pro forma manner, at the suggestion of the gentleman who introduced it. I find no fault and pass no criticism upon that; but I have a right to refer to it as a matter of record, as showing how this question came before the House. Now I submit that in the regular course of practice that resolution should have gone either to the Committee on Rules under the uniform practice of the House, or else to the Committee on the Columbian Exposition. But be that as it may, I do not propose to wander off into a discussion of the merits of an investigation.

To anyone who desires to be informed, there is no difficulty in learning all the particulars connected with this Exposition. The amount of money that has been appropriated by Congress has been specifically designated for specific purposes, and a very small amount of it, the minimum amount of it, has been expended by the World's Columbian Commission. The sum of $400,000 has been expended in the erection of a public building under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, in pursuance of the laws regulating the construction of public buildings. More than one-half or two-thirds of the balance of the appropriation has been or will be expended by the board of control and management appointed by the heads of Departments in the preparation of the Government exhibit.

Now I call the attention of the House to the fact that in the report submitted by the Committee on Appropriations they give the House no reason—there is not a single allegation or assertion—why this investigation should be made, and particularly no reason why the Committee on Appropriations should make it. My distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] gives as his reason for having this investigation made, that under certain rulings of the Secretary of the Treasury——

Mr. SAYERS. One reason——

Mr. REILLY. One reason he gives, and the only one stated on the floor when he was addressing the House, why the Committee on Appropriations should make this investigation was, he complained, that under certain rulings of the Treasury Department, the Secretary of the Treasury claimed the right to erect a light-house as an exhibit on the part of the Government at the Columbian Exposition out of moneys that were specifically appropriated for the erection of light-houses at other places, and not specifically appropriated for expenditures of the World's Columbian Exposition.

The correctness of that ruling I do not wish to stop to discuss; but I am sorry that my friend from Texas had not informed himself as to the language of the act of April 15, 1890, when he made that complaint, or he would have found no fault with it, because that act specifically authorized and commanded and directed the Secretary of the Treasury to erect one of the light-houses authorized by existing law to be placed on exhibition at the Columbian Exposition, and afterward removed, to be located at the place where existing law directs; but if the gentleman's statement was correct I submit it is very trivial, to say the least.

Then my friend, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], who introduced this resolution, when he addressed the House, gave as his reason that one of the officials of this World's Columbian Commission has received what he regards as an excessive salary. Perhaps I might agree with him in that, but I think it is entirely foreign to the discussion here, and I will say in passing, that that whole subject was investigated by the Quadro-Centennial or World's Columbian Exposition Committee in the last Congress, and their report on that subject was made to this House.

However, in the few moments that are allotted to me I wish to confine myself simply to the naked question that is before the House, and that is a question that demands the serious attention of this House, because it involves the etiquette and the courtesy and the spirit and sense of fair play that should characterize our action in our intercourse with each other in the proceedings of this body. As the attention of the House has been already called to the matter, the Committee on Appropriations have a well-defined jurisdiction, as was read by my colleague, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY], and there can be no pretense that that rule can be tortured into any sort of construction that would give the Committee on Appropriations jurisdiction over matters connected with the World's Fair.

Now, I have said that at no time and in no manner since this subject came before Congress was jurisdiction ever conferred upon the Committee on Appropriations by this House; and when the subject did come before Congress in the Fiftieth and Fifty-first Congresses, all those matters were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that committee took jurisdiction of the matter. In the Fifty-first Congress they had the subject under consideration for many months, until, as the subject grew in importance, the Committee on Rules, in pursuance of a resolution that was introduced in the House and referred to them, reported back in favor of the appointment of a select committee to take charge of this subject; and I ask the Clerk, for the information of the House, to read that resolution.

The Clerk read as follow:

Resolved, That a select committee of nine members be appointed by the Speaker, to be called the World's Fair Committee, to whom shall be referred all matters relating to the proposed celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America, or the World's Fair of 1892.

Mr. REILLY. Now when that resolution was reported by the Committee on Rules, it was antagonized by Mr. Cannon, who was also a member of the Committee on Rules and also chairman of the Appropriations Committee, with a minority report, in which he recommended the retention of the jurisdiction of this subject in the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The House considered the question, and upon its being debated and voted upon by this House, the judgment of the House was that the subject was of importance enough to demand and require the consideration of a select committee, and it voted for the appointment of a select committee. That committee entered upon the discharge of its duties, and all matters referred theretofore to the Committee on Foreign Affairs were taken and referred to the Committee on the Quadro-Centennial.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DURBOROW. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WATSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. REILLY. If it does not come out of my time.

Mr. WATSON. I ask the gentleman to state whether or not he does not expect their resolution to be virtually a committal of this House to further appropriations?

Mr. REILLY. No, sir; I do not so consider it, and I do not think it can fairly be given that construction by anybody.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Does the gentleman——

Mr. REILLY. I beg that the gentleman will excuse me. I will yield to the gentleman if it does not come out of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will come out of the gentleman's time.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Very well.

Mr. REILLY. If I had time I would be glad to answer any question of the gentleman.

I want to say, in answer to the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], that all the legislation that has been enacted by Congress thus far has been by measures reported by the Committee on the World's Fair.

Mr. SAYERS. What as to the appropriations?

Mr. REILLY. I will come to that directly.

In the last session of the last Congress there was a recommendation or report recommending further legislation, made by the Committee on the World's Fair, but owing to the pressure of time it could not be taken up separately for consideration, and was incorporated in the sundry civil appropriation bill; and every dollar appropriated in the sundry civil appropriation bill was in pursuance of some purpose that was authorized by the act of April 25, 1890, and was made upon precisely the same theory that you appropriate to pay the salary of the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAYERS. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] five minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, one thing should not be forgotten by this House. I call attention to that part of the discussion which claims that the jurisdiction over appropriations should be given to the Committee on the Columbian Exposition. When the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] in charge of the report of the Committee on Rules brought in the rule creating that special committee, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] arose in his place and asked if that would confer the power of appropriation on the Committee on the Columbian Exposition. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] stated that it would not; and the rule creating that special committee was adopted without opposition.

Now it is contended, after that statement and after the unanimous adoption of the organization of that committee, that the Appropriation Committee has no power even to appropriate, although my friend who has just taken his seat [Mr. REILLY] admits that in the sundry civil appropriation bill of the last Congress appropriations were made. The amount covered in that bill, out of the total appropriation of $1,088,000, was $668,000. It was put upon the appropriation bill. Now a word as to the argument——

Mr. REILLY. You are mistaken about that.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. As to what?

Mr. REILLY. As to the whole amount being appropriated for.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I say that $668,000 out of the $1,088,000 was appropriated on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

Mr. REILLY. That is right. I say that the appropriation for the World's Fair was in pursuance of law.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. All the appropriations are made in pursuance of law.

Mr. REILLY. Exactly.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Exactly. There is no contention on that point. But now it is contended that under Rule XI this matter can not go into the sundry civil appropriation bill. Gentlemen say that these matters can not go to the Committee on Appropriations, and contend that this appropriation can no longer go on that bill. We have a construction of it given by the appropriation of $668,000 in the last Congress. But where did the gentleman get his interpretation of the meaning of the sundry civil appropriation bill. Why, according to their construction, they would put in that bill just what pleases them and exclude from it what does not please them.

The sundry civil bill, in its operation, has always had scope and sweep enough for the purpose of covering many things required to be done by the Government. It is one of the most important bills coming from the Committee on Appropriations, and there is nothing that any gentleman can produce in this House to show that this matter should be excluded from the sundry civil appropriation bill; and besides, that authority has been exercised already in the last preceding Congress.

Now, I want to say one word about the investigation. So far as I am concerned, I have no personal pride or preference about this matter.

I do not want to be on any investigating committee, but I believe there are things that should be investigated. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBOROW], who offers the substitute has himself repeatedly made the same statement. I have cited one illustration of the necessity for investigation and for action, and, under the rules adopted by the House, there is no question but that we have the power to reduce expenditures and to cut down the enormous salaries that these gentlemen, or some of them at least, are drawing.

I want to say once more that there is no occasion for rivalry in this matter. We are simply exercising here the power which belongs to the appropriating committee, to get all needed information to enable it to make the appropriations. The new rules give to the committee increased powers; and if it is found upon investigation that things are being done which ought not to be done, and expenditures are being made which should be cut down or curtailed, the committee has power, under the new rule, to cut them down or to curtail them.

Mr. DURBOROW. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. BUTLER. I want a minute to present an amendment which expresses my view better than I could do it myself.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out the words "Committee on Appropriations" in the first line of the resolution and in the substitute proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, and insert in their stead the following words:

"A select committee of seven members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, which committee so appointed, etc." so that it will read: "Resolved, That a select committee of seven members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, which committee so appointed is hereby ordered to inquire," etc.

Mr. DURBOROW. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I have five minutes more from the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER].

Mr. DOLLIVER. No, that was covered back into the Treasury. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I rise to correct the impression, or the seeming impression, which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] has who first addressed the House on this subject regarding the position of the members of the House from Illinois with respect to this great Exposition. We stand in precisely the same relation to this question that the Representatives from Iowa and other States do. It is a great national enterpise. The city of Chicago has given to the nation a site for this World's Fair, and her people have contributed the munificent sum of $10,000,000, a sum of money twice as large as that raised for any other great exposition of a similar character in the history of the world.,

I am proud to represent on this floor, in part, a State whose citizens have shown such princely liberality and patriotism. But upon the matter at issue on the pending resolution my position is no different from that of any other member of the House. The members from Illinois neither seek an investigation as contemplated in the resolution nor attempt to avoid one. This is for the House to determine, not as a local but a national question. Speaking for myself, I do not believe there is any occasion for such an investigation, but inasmuch as the question has been raised I believe now that it will be in the interest of the Fair that a committee be appointed to make an investigation.

I have had a long personal acquaintance with Director-General Davis, and I speak what all who are acquainted with him will verify when I say that no better selection could have been made for this position. He is a man of superb executive ability, honest, fearless, and faithful, in the prime of life, zealous, and ambitious to make this great enterprise a grand success.

The salary that is being paid him is no higher than he could command in the private walks of life, where neither the annoyances or vexations of the position would disturb him nor the necessary expense of the place would be incurred by him.

I very much deprecate, Mr. Speaker, the remarks made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] when he was discussing this resolution, in his reference to the salary paid to the director-general. I feel sure that in his calmer moments the criticisms he has made upon that gentleman will be withdrawn. Among the statements made by him was a reference to the service of Mr. Davis as a member of this House, and that in his service here he was conspicuous principally for his silence upon the floor. It was not my fortune to be a member of this House during Mr. Davis's service, but I know from tradition that he left his impress upon the Congresses in which he served, and that he was not as frequently upon his feet in debate as some members is no charge against his ability or influence as a member.

I remember, Mr. Speaker, years ago as a boy having as a part of my duties as a farm hand to turn the crank of an old-fashioned fanning mill to clean the wheat used for seeding purposes in the springtime, and I always noticed that when the wheat in the hopper ran low and the mill was running empty it made the most noise.

My observation since I have been a member of this House has taught me that it often happens that the lightest-headed and the least influential member is the man who makes the most noise, and is most frequently upon his feet. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. No personal reflection upon the gentleman from Iowa, I hope?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Oh, no; no personal reflection at all upon any one.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Is it personal experience? [Laughter.]

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. No further than it grows out of my relations with the gentleman from Iowa. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Which are very close.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. True; we are friends and I hope ever shall be.

Another point, Mr. Speaker, on this question of salary that I desire to bring to the attention of the House:

The director-general of the World's Fair has certain social obligations that require the expenditure of a large annual sum of money to discharge. I can well illustrate this by the case of the Speaker of the House. As a member of this Congress he receives the same salary that all others do, namely, $5,000 per annum. In electing him as Speaker over this body he is required to perform certain social obligations that are not incumbent upon the members. The law recognizes this, and has provided that the Speaker of the House shall receive $3,000 per annum more than a member upon the floor. Now, it is no disparagement to the present Speaker of this House to say that in ability, experience, and all other qualities he is no greater than when he was a member upon the floor receiving only $5,000 per annum, and if we were to apply the same rule to him that the gentleman from Iowa, judging from his remarks, seemingly seeks to apply to the director-general, he would not be entitled to this additional $3,000 furnished him by virtue of his being Speaker of the House.

As was explained in the last Congress when the special committee was appointed and sent to Chicago for the purpose of investigating this very question, the director-general of the World's Fair is given this salary not only to compensate him for his splendid services, but in part, as in the case of the Speaker just referred to, to enable him to discharge with dignity the social part of the duties of the great position which he holds.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. The local corporation does all the work; he does not do any of it.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The gentleman is mistaken. The director-general is the man who supervises the entire work, and who is required to and has an exact knowledge of all the departments and of all the work that is being done. Now, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as this matter has been so prominently brought before the House and the country, as I have already stated, it may be wise to appoint a committee and have them investigate the whole subject contemplated in the original resolution offered by the Committee on Appropriations; but inasmuch as there is a question of conflict of jurisdiction between the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on the Columbian Fair, it seems to me that it would be better for all concerned to have a special committee appointed for this purpose by the Speaker of the House; and in the interest of harmony and to avoid the question of jealousy which has arisen between the two committees contending for the right to name this committee, I now offer an amendment to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois on behalf of the Committee on Columbian Exposition. The amendment reads as follows:

Amend by striking out the words "the Committee on the Columbian Exposition" and insert "a special committee of nine members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker as a select committee."

If this statement is adopted, the investigation will go on, and the House will be put in possession of all the facts that any member may think is necessary for him to know in order to properly cast his vote upon any question of appropriation for this Exposition which may come up hereafter during this session of Congress.

This puts the selection of these nine members into the hands of the Speaker. Some of them can be taken from the Committee on Appropriations and others from the Committee on the Columbian Exposition, and this will get a committee who will do equal and exact justice to the country and the Commission as well, and by their report will present all the facts that are covered in the resolutions which have been offered by the respective committees now contending for the right to take charge of the proposed investigation. [Applause.]

Mr. DURBUROW. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CHIPMAN].

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the resolution for the appointment of a special committee will be adopted. We are now in the midst of a contest very common in this House between two committees as to their power and jurisdiction—a contest which, it strikes me, is entirely unprofitable, and which, by the adoption of the motion which has been submitted, can be disposed of agreeably, as I hope, to everybody concerned.

The Appropriations Committee has plenty to do; it is a crowded committee, and whether it will have time to devote to an investigation as thorough as this ought to be is in my mind extremely problematical. I have great confidence in that committee. On the other hand, I have great confidence in the Committee on the Columbian Exposition. I took occasion a few moments ago to look at the names of the members who compose these two committees. Among them I find men well known in this House for their devotion to the public business and for their watchfulness as to the public expenditures. Yet these men, equally good—members of these two committees—are engaged in this contest. Now, I submit to the House that we may get rid of the whole matter, so far as a contest between these two committees is concerned, by the simple process of having a committee appointed with special reference to this investigation. With that in view the Speaker would be careful in his choice.

The men appointed would be adapted to this investigation—would be men without any local prejudice, or without any prejudice whatever, in the matter of the Columbian Exposition, and would be animated entirely by a disposition to ascertain the exact facts of the expenditure of the public money in this connection.

I submit, sir, that instead of wasting our time here in determining who are good men for this work, the Speaker be authorized to select good men from both these committees, and constitute a committee in which the House will have full confidence. They will be men in whom I, for one, and in whom other gentlemen who have served with them as long as I have, entertain unlimited confidence. This strikes me as the proper way out of the present difficulty; and this I hope will be the course adopted by the House.

Mr. DURBOROW. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKENNA].

Mr. BUSHNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBOROW] whether he objects to the scope of this inquiry being as great as that proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Several MEMBERS. No.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Why not then adopt an amendment to that effect?

A MEMBER. We propose to do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MCKENNA. Mr. Speaker, contests between committees are too apt to be considered as having their impulse in jealousy, and too apt to assume the form of an attempt to take or to keep power. Such a contest at first view is a vulgar one, and not likely to excite sympathy anywhere; or if it does excite sympathy, it is of that neutral kind which the old lady permitted herself to feel when her husband was in conflict with the bear.

But, Mr. Speaker, such contests are inevitable. Else, committees would be of little use. Does not jealous vigilance preside everywhere in our governmental system, standing sentinel over little things as well as over big things?

But, sir, if the present contest is invidious, it is less in degree and more justifiable in fact on the part of the World's Fair Committee than on the part of the Appropriations Committee. The latter is a committee of high dignity and engrossing functions, and would be such whether there was or was not a World's Fair or a World's Fair Committee; and its functions would engross all its time without its assuming detective duties or powers, or starting on inquisitorial junketings to inquire into disorders, extravagances, or misdoings. On the other hand (and I invite the strict attention of the House to this view), the Committee on the World's Fair is a special creation.

If it has not the power that is claimed for it, it is "as idle as a painted ship upon a painted ocean." It was constituted in the last House, with its jurisdiction exactly defined and exactly interpreted. It framed, reported, and passed the bill that gave national character to the World's Fair, and made it and its business of Congressional concern and cognizance. It should not require any argument to show that the jurisdiction which was adequate to create Congressional cognizance is adequate to take and exercise that cognizance, because its jurisdiction is defined in this House exactly in the terms in which it was defined in the last Congress. That can not be disputed.

What then is involved? Fair play to the Committee on the World's Fair is involved. Is the House interested in that? I think so. It is the "touch of nature" that makes everyone of us feel "how it is himself." Before the assignment of members to committees we may not care about questions of this kind; but after the assignment we do care how our committees are treated. That is not jealousy; it is duty. The rules which define the jurisdiction of committees define their privileges as well; and those privileges should be respected unless the interest of the House commands otherwise. Does the interest of the House command otherwise? The Appropriations Committee is competent and able to exercise any duty that the House may devolve upon it. It is composed, it is true, of able men; and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] says that the "eagle eye of Mr. HOLMAN" is there.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I looked at the gentleman to see if he was smiling when he necessarily called to mind the concluding words of his resolution, which looked to a junketing trip and $500 for other expenses each time the chairman of the committee should think necessary. I did not know but that he was laughing through his sleeve at the House; for a man must be devoid of humor indeed who can not see something incongruous, something absolutely grotesque and funny in the idea of the gentleman from Indiana at the head of the Committee on Appropriations bearing aloft a banner with that strange device, the Holman amendment, parading in palace cars, wining and dining in sumptuous saloons and gilded caravansaries at the expense of a suffering Treasury.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. You are measuring this by your San Francisco customs. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCKENNA. No; I am measuring it by the "eagle eye" of which you spoke.

What fun and play we mice will have when he is away! What can not then be performed with an unguarded Treasury?

But, sir, does the House demand that this matter should be referred to the Committee on Appropriations? I admit that it is an able committee, but has it more time, has it more willingness, more ability to do the work or greater facilites to carry on an investigation than the Committee on the World's Fair? And, as has been suggested, we have two of their men, and two of the best of them, because we would not take anyone else on our committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not see any necessity for the resolution at all. If we have jurisdiction of the World's Fair management, sir, it owes us attention and reports. Has it been derelict. There is no intimation that it has been.

Mr. Speaker, at the commencement of this session of Congress this House passed the resolution which I hold in my hand. I invite the attention of the House to the language of the resolution, because it has a bearing directly upon this subject. The concluding proviso is as follows:

Provided, That the Committee on Appropriations shall have power to send for persons and papers and administer oaths in pursuance of inquiries touching any matter of legislation referred to it by the House, and shall have leave to sit during the sessions of the House.

Now, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] says that properly the Committee on Appropriations has jurisdiction of this matter. Under that resolution, Mr. Speaker, I apprehend that they can investigate the World's Fair management so far as it touches the appropriations that are requested by it, and no further than that did the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] say they desired to go. I would like to ask him, or some other member of the Committee on Appropriations, having that jurisdiction why do they claim the additional jurisdiction asked for by this special resolution? Do they want to go to further expense? Do you want further powers, when you have all the powers you have asked for in the resolution that I have just read?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I will answer if you will allow me.

Mr. McKENNA. Not in my time, if you please.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. We want to make an investigation, and while we may spend $500 we may possibly thereby save millions.

Mr. McKENNA. A great deal has been said about appropriations that may be called for hereafter. I am a member of the Committee on the World's Fair. I should, Mr. Speaker, I think, be very derelict in my duty if I voted one dollar of appropriation, if my judgment approved otherwise, until I had investigated all the purposes to which that appropriation was to be devoted, and until I had considered all the objects to which the former appropriations had been applied. Can the Committee on Appropriations do any more than that? They have the power to do it, as far as their appropriations are concerned now, under the resolution on which has been passed already by the House, vesting them with the functions to which I have already referred. What more do they want?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DURBOROW. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FELLOWS].

Mr. FELLOWS. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with very much of curious interest for the assignment of some reason on the part of those gentlemen of this House who represent the Committee on Appropriations, to ascertain why it was that we should be called upon to vote a lack of confidence in a committee to whom we have delegated a peculiar and important duty here, for surely there can be no other construction placed upon our action, if this substitute shall not prevail. Some time ago, in another Congress and under another name, you gave to a committee complete and absolute control over affairs relating to our great Exposition. Recently you have given to that same committee another name, but in doing so have subrogated them to all the rights, powers, privileges, and responsibilities which attached to the first committee.

I can not concur with those gentlemen who assume that no distinction is to be drawn between the mere ascertainment of the possible necessity for an appropriation and the appropriation itself. The scope of the duty which we seek to impose here upon either one of these committees does not necessarily contemplate an appropriation. It is merely an inquiry into the necessity perhaps for an appropriation. An investigation may disclose the fact that no such necessity exists; and I certainly can not agree with the argument, earnest and zealous as it was, of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT], who seeks to find some analogy between the action of the Committee on Appropriations in its scrutiny of the use of money that has been before appropriated to great departments, great purposes of government, and that work which is asked of this committee now.

The governmental purposes exist forever. There is no lapse. They remain permanent. Your sundry civil bill existed in the last Congress, it exists in this, and will in the next. Your deficiency bill and the other great matters over which this committee is called upon to exercise its functions and control forever have their place in this House and before the country; and the Appropriations Committee exist forever for the discharge of this duty. This is a permanent, existing thing, but your Columbian Exposition, vast as it is in its scope, splendid in its design, is after all but incidental, transient, and ephemeral. You made one appropriation, for one purpose. There is no gentleman upon the floor of this House who can say with absolute certainty that any additional appropriation will ever be needed, and therefore the right and power of the Appropriations Committee to inquire into this one appropriation, made once for all and for a particular purpose, is not, I insist, at all akin to that power they exercise in the investigation of the expenditure of money made from year to year and appropriations for the great purposes of the Government.

There is one other reason why this power should not be intrusted to the Committee on Appropriations. Already their powers are vast. The volume of work they are called upon to perform is infinitely in excess of that assigned to any other committee of this House. Very largely they have drawn within their grasp the control of the legislative function of this House. I am not disposed to enlarge it, by my vote, beyond its appropriate limitations. I believe that there is some work for others to do, and with the most absolute confidence in the ability and desire of the gentleman upon that committee to perform well and patriotically the work that has been assigned to them, it is so vast in extent now that any enlargement of it must necessarily impair something of its efficiency.

But the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HERBERT] tells us that the committee is required to go to Chicago and that that requires an appropriation. Surely he does not believe that that limited expenditure for that purpose is within the peculiar scope of the Committee on Appropriations, for if that rule was to prevail no member of the House could be buried except under the direction of the Committee on Appropriations, because the committee you appoint to accompany the deceased to his last home necessarily incurs an expense in going and returning. It is not that character of expenditure, that kind of work, that is properly relegated to the control of this important committee, but it is that work which I have referred to which exists this year and will exist next year, and which relates to the permanent function of government.

Now, sir, I come back to the proposition with which I first started. Why shall we vote to this Committee on the Columbian Exposition an expression of our lack of confidence, either in their ability or their capacity, to perform the work contemplated, both in the resolution and in the substitute? It seems to me we have no right to fix that which will be a reproach upon the committee by denying to them in this seemingly important work the privilege of performing a duty which the clear letter of the law, under which they are created, contemplates. And, unless some reason can be given, unless some assurance can be expressed here, that enables me to know that the public service will be better attended to——

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time belongs to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBOROW].

Mr. FELLOWS. I have no desire to further occupy the time of the House.

Mr. DURBOROW. I yield five minutes more time to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FELLOWS. I will not avail myself of the courtesy offered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois still has additional time, which he proposes to yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FELLOWS] if he wishes it, but the Chair understands the gentleman from New York to say that he does not care to avail himself of the privilege.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to invite the attention of this House at this time to the difference in the character of the two pending resolutions. It will be remembered that no step whatever was taken by the Committee on the World's Columbian Exposition until after the resolution had been offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The resolution which is presented in the form of a substitute by the Committee on Appropriations does not contemplate that that committee shall in its report commit this House to any proposition looking to further appropriations to assist the Exposition. The only object of the resolution, its sole purpose, is to inquire into the manner in which the law has been executed, and the methods which have been adopted in the appointment of officials and the salaries which have been allowed such officials.

Mr. REILLY. I desire to say to the gentleman, while he is discussing that particular point, that it is my purpose at the proper time to offer an amendment to the resolution reported by the Committee on Appropriations, striking out the words "Committee on Appropriations" and inserting the words "Committee on the World's Columbian Exposition," so as to take your resolution just as it is, if there is any difference on that point.

Mr. SAYERS. I observe, Mr. Speaker, that the gentlemen who constitute the World's Fair Committee are asking that an amendment shall be offered to the resolution proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, and also to their own resolution, to strike out both the committees and to insert a special one.

Mr. REILLY. I want to deny that statement, Mr. Speaker. I do not think it ought to be left unchallenged. I do not know that anything of that kind has been done.

Mr. SAYERS. Ask the gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of your committee.

Mr. REILLY. I do not believe the chairman of the committee has done anything of the kind.

Mr. SAYERS. I say, ask the gentleman from Illinois if he has not made the proposition.

Mr. DURBOROW. What was that?

Mr. SAYERS. I suggested that the gentleman should ask you whether a proposition had not been made to strike out both committees and to insert a special committee.

Mr. DURBOROW. The proposition was made to me.

Mr. SAYERS. Did I make the proposition to you?

Mr. DURBOROW. What did the gentleman say?

Mr. SAYERS. Did I make that proposition?

Mr. DURBOROW. I said that that was a proposition which was made to me on the floor.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman came to me with the proposition, and that was the first I heard about it.

Mr. REILLY. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] offered such an amendment; but he did that of his own volition.

Mr. SAYERS. They do not favor this resolution, and I think that the House should understand the scope and character of their own proposition. Now, let us see what their proposition is.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. If the gentleman from Illinois proposes to adopt this resolution reported by the Committee on Appropriations, and simply to insert that the matter shall be referred to the Committee on the Columbian Exposition, what objection has the gentleman to it?

Mr. SAYERS. That the matter should be referred to the Committee on the Columbian Exposition?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. This resolution. If he proposes to adopt your resolution, and simply substitutes that it shall go to the Committee on the Columbian Exposition, what objection have you to that?

Mr. SAYERS. I am opposed to it, for the reason that the Committee on Appropriations is authorized by the rules of the House to consider questions of appropriations, and will be called upon to consider and report upon the appropriation of the balance between that which has already been appropriated and $1,500,000 originally authorized to enable the Government to make its exhibit.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me, is there any appropriation contained in this resolution, either that proposed by the Committee on the Columbian Exposition, or that of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly not.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Then your reason is not a good one.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, what is the resolution proposed by the Committee on the Columbian Exposition? If any gentleman thinks it is a matter of consequence whether this committee or that committee should have charge of this investigation, let me say to him that it is of greater consequence that the resolution to be adopted should be carefully considered before it is finally acted upon.

The resolution proposed by the Committee on the Columbian Exposition reads:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Columbian Exposition is hereby ordered to ascertain and report whether the said act of Congress, approved April 25, 1890, is being complied with—

So far so good—

and whether subsequent appropriations made for said Exposition are being judiciously expended—

So far so good—and whether the officers and employés are being properly and reasonably paid—

So far so good—

and what amount of money has been expended by the United States Government, and the manner and necessity of such expenditure—

So far so good. But here is the point to which I desire to call the special attention of the House—

And what additional amount, if any, is necessary to be expended, and what further legislation, if any, is necessary.

Mr. McCREARY. Right at that point will the gentleman from Texas allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SAYERS. I will.

Mr. McCREARY. I desire to say that that part of the statement you have just made, taken from the resolution reported by the Committee on the Columbian Exposition, with reference to the expenditures to be made, is in order to finish the building now being erected by the Secretary of the Treasury for a proper display of the Government exhibits. That is what that part of the resolution refers to. But, in addition to that——

Mr. SAYERS. It does not say so.

Mr. McCREARY. But, in addition to that, I wish to say that I understand the chairman of the Committee on the Columbian Exposition is in favor of substituting for "Appropriations" the words "Columbian Exposition" in that resolution, and take just what you ask for in your resolution.

Mr. SAYERS. Of course. Now the gentlemen are abandoning their own resolution.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. You are abandoning your own resolution.

Mr. SAYERS. After a discussion of your resolution, you are abandoning it, except that part as to the committee.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Do you not want your resolution adopted?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly, I do; but your action indicates this: After you have given a careful study to the subject, you have brought in your resolution, and now abandon it, excepting only that you hope that the House would be moved by sympathy for the Committee on the Columbian Exposition to permit it to execute a resolution which it first antagonized.

Mr. REILLY. Nobody has antagonized the resolution offered by the Committee on Appropriations, except as to the power of making the inquiry.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, if the resolution reported from the Committee on the Columbian Exposition be adopted, then that committee can go to Chicago, if it pleases, or remain here. It may inquire into the manner in which the affairs of that Exposition have been conducted, and can recommend to this House legislation providing for the expenditure of five or six millions of dollars, in one form or another, for the relief of that association.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. If the Committee on the Columbian Exposition is authorized to investigate these matters and does investigate them and does report how the money has been expended, and we adopt your resolution, then there is no power in that committee to make any investigation with reference to the future.

Mr. SAYERS. Of course not, if your resolution is not adopted.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Then why do you object to it?

Mr. SAYERS. For the reason that your resolution is standing now as a substitute for ours and will be voted upon unless you withdraw it, and for the further reason that your every action shows you to be hostile to our resolution. Mr. Speaker, if these gentlemen had intended that the World's Fair should be inquired into, if they had desired that a calcium light of a close investigation should be thrown upon its acts and doings, then why were they not here in advance, proposing a resolution of inquiry? Instead of that they waited until a resolution had been offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] and reported back to the House by the Committee on Appropriations, and then they come forward with a substitute which, if adopted, would authorize them to bring into the House a resolution to expend upon the World's Fair five or six million dollars more.

Mr. DOLLIVER. We have that power now.

Mr. REILLY. Why was not that resolution referred in the first place to the Committee on the Columbian Exposition instead of to the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. SAYERS. You must ask the Speaker.

Mr. REILLY. Well, we have heard how that happened.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not care about further detaining the House, but will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DURBOROW. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. REILLY].

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as an amendment to the substitute reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that, as the Chair understands it, no more amendments are now in order.

Mr. REILLY. I do not understand it so, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. There is pending a resolution reported by the Committee on Appropriations in lieu of the original; there is pending a motion to amend that; there is pending a substitute and a motion to amend the substitute.

Mr. REILLY. I do not understand that there is any amendment pending to the resolution reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. There is an amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BUTLER].

Mr. REILLY. Well, would not an amendment to an amendment be in order?

The SPEAKER. An amendment to that amendment would be in order.

Mr. REILLY. Well, then, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment to the amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out, on the first line of the resolution, the word "Appropriations" and insert in lieu thereof "Columbian Exposition."

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is an amendment in the second degree to a substitute in order under the rules?

The SPEAKER. Under the rules an amendment to an amendment, a substitute and an amendment to the substitute are in order.

Mr. DOCKERY. But there is one amendment to the substitute pending.

The SPEAKER. But the amendment of the gentleman [Mr. REILLY] is not to the substitute. It is to the original text, as the Chair understands.

Mr. REILLY. Yes; it is an amendment to the original resolution reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. Speaker, there was so much confusion that we did not hear the reading very distinctly in this part of the Hall, and therefore I wish to ask the Speaker with reference to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. As I understand it, he proposes to strike out the Committee on Appropriations where it occurs in the resolution reported by that committee and to substitute for it the Committee on Columbian Exposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman understands it correctly. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBOROW] how much time he has remaining.

Mr. DURBOROW. Five minutes. I have yielded two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SAYERS. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that it is near 4 o'clock and that I have some unexpired time as well as the gentleman on the other side.

Mr. REILLY (to Mr. SAYERS). Do you consider that the debate is closed?

Mr. SAYERS. It closes at 4 o'clock.

Mr. REILLY. But now? Are you through on your side?

Mr. SAYERS. Oh, no.

Mr. REILLY. Then I simply desire to say, Mr. Speaker, in offering this amendment to the original resolution, as I stated to the gentleman from Texas when he was addressing the House a moment ago, that at no time has there been a disposition on our part to antagonize the resolution reported by the Committee on Appropriations in its substance, character, or form. We have not sought to make any issue either as to the necessity or the propriety of the proposed investigation or the scope or the character it shall take.

But we have antagonized and denied the claim of the Appropriations Committee, under the rules of this House, to be the propers committee to make that investigation, and I offer this amendment now in perfect good faith, for the purpose of carrying an assurance to the House that, so far as the Committee on the Columbian Exposition is concerned, the desire of the members of that committee is simply to make an investigation of any character, or to any extent, or in any form that the House shall direct, if it shall decide to direct one at all.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. You do not object to any kind of weapon, provided it is in friendly hands. [Laughter.]

Mr. REILLY. I don't know what the gentleman means by that. He has expressed himself as being "friendly" to the Exposition.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I am; but not to any vicious condition or mismanagement in connection with it.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. No vicious conditions or mismanagement have been shown, and the gentleman has no right to indulge in such remarks.

Mr. REILLY. The gentleman says he is not in favor of any vicious conditions or mismanagement. Neither am I, sir, and the gentleman has no right to impugn my motives or those of the members of our committee, or to attribute to them any motives which he is not willing to have attributed to himself. I assume that the integrity of the members of the Committee on the Columbian Exposition and the integrity of the other members of this House is equal to that of the members of the Committee on Appropriations, and that the gentlemen of that committee do not monopolize all the integrity or all the virtue of the House.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. That is right. But this does not touch the question of integrity at all. There is the question of integrity, and there is the question of zeal.

Mr. REILLY. Well, I do not know what you mean by such remarks.

Mr. DURBOROW. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have some time left, and I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS].

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against this proposition from the Committee on Appropriations, and for this reason: It seems to me, sir, to be a proposition based upon a supposition that the Committee on the World's Fair are not worthy of being intrusted with the proposed investigation. Now, sir, as a man, as a member of this House, and as a member of a committee of this House, I can not and I will not cast any such imputation upon a committee of this House.

Sir, the only basis that I have heard so far suggested for an investigation is the fact that Mr. Davis gets $15,000 a year as superintendent or director of the World's Fair. Why, Whitelaw Reid, our minister to France, gets $17,500; William Walter Phelps, as minister to Germany, gets the same; Robert T. Lincoln, as minister to England, gets the same; the justices of the supreme court of New York City, the same; Charles A. Dana, of the Sun, gets $50,000 a year salary; Col. John A. Cockerill, late managing editor of the World, got $15,000. Why should not Mr. Davis have his money if he is worth it? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the House will proceed to vote on the pending proposition. The Committee on Appropriations has reported, in lieu of the original proposition, a resolution proposing an investigation "into the management of the World's Fair and the expenditures therefor." The first amendment to be voted upon is that submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. REILLY], which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. REILLY moves to amend by striking out, in the first line of the resolution reported as a substitute, the word "Appropriations," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "Columbian Exposition."

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to have the resolution reported by the Committee on Appropriations read.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Appropriations has reported a substitute for the resolution referred to it. The Clerk will report that substitute, omitting the preamble, unless the reading of that be insisted upon.

Mr. SAYERS. I suggest that the substitute be read instead of the original.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is treating as the original the resolution reported by the committee in lieu of the original.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations is hereby ordered to inquire and report to this House whether those obligated and undertaking, and now engaged to do so, have justly and properly complied with the requirements of the said act of Congress approved April 25, 1890, and whether all expenditures of whatever character for said Exposition have been judiciously made; whether the number of employés and appointees to carry out and into effect the laws is excessive and their compensation reasonable or otherwise, and to ascertain and report the salary or compensation paid to each officer and employé, from what State the several appointments have been made, and generally whether, in the care and conduct of said Exposition, proper management has been had; that they obtain a full report, of those in charge of the expenditure of money, of all such expenditures, together with copies of the monthly pay rolls of all officers and appointees, and that the report of the committee, based upon said inquiry, may be made at any time to Congress, but at the earliest day possible, consistent with the necessities of the inquiries involved in this resolution; and that the expenses of the committee or of any subcommittee it may designate to prosecute these inquiries and examination shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, and the chairman of said committee or of such subcommittee, if one be designated, is authorized to draw for the same on the Clerk of the House in sums not to exceed $500 at any one time.

The SPEAKER. The first amendment on which the House will vote is that offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. REILLY].

The amendment of Mr. REILLY was again read.

Mr. McCREARY. The effect of that amendment, as I understand, is to substitute the Committee on the Columbian Exposition for the Committee on Appropriations. [Cries of "Order."]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. REILLY, there were—ayes 79, noes 102.

Mr. REILLY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. O'FERRALL. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again read.

The Clerk again read the amendment of Mr. REILLY.

Mr. O'FERRALL. How will the substitute read as proposed to be amended?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, with the permission of the House, that the whole effect of the amendment is to substitute the Committee on the Columbian Exposition for the Committee on Appropriations as the committee to make the proposed investigation.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 99, nays 147, not voting 85; as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The following additional pairs was announced:

Mr. MCMILLIN with Mr. WHEELER of Alabama, on this vote.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. LAWSON, has been called home on account of sickness.

Mr. ENLOE. I am paired with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. HAUGEN]. If he were present I should vote no.

Mr. CURTIS, Mr. MOSES, and others, having failed to hear their names called during the roll call, asked permission to record their votes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the rule is very explicit on this subject. The Clerk will read clause 1 of Rule XV.

The Clerk read as follows:

RULE XV.

ON CALLS OF THE ROLL AND HOUSE.

1. Upon every roll call, the names of the members shall be called alphabetically by surname, except when two or more have the same surname, in which case the name of the State shall be added; and if there be two such members from the same State, the whole name shall be called; and after the roll has been once called, the Clerk shall call in their alphabetical order the names of those not voting; and thereafter the Speaker shall not entertain a request to record a vote or announce a pair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that this has been the rule for many years. There has been some latitude in respect to this matter allowed by various occupants of the Speaker's chair. The gentleman who presided in the Fifty-first Congress adopted a rule which I believe required a gentleman to state that he was in his seat listening when his name was called. Prior to that Mr. CARLISLE adopted a practice, notwithstanding the express provision of the rule then in force which the Clerk has just read, that if a gentleman stated he was in his seat and had not heard his name called, he might be permitted to vote. And yet the rule, as will be observed, is imperative that after the second call of the roll the Chair shall not be permitted to entertain a request for unanimous consent to record a vote. But it seems hard if a gentleman is in his place and does vote and the vote is not recorded, or if the Clerk should fail to call the name, that he should be prohibited from having his vote recorded.

Therefore, the present occupant of the chair will go back, as he understands it, to the practice in the Fiftieth Congress, so that when a gentleman states he was in his seat and had not heard his name called he should be permitted to vote.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, the rule was that if a member stated he was in the Hall or within the bar of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not positive.

Mr. ENLOE. I think that was the rule.

Mr. OATES. That was the practice.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will look to it, and conform to the rule then existing.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBOROW], to which an amendment is pending. The Clerk will first report the substitute and then the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Columbian Exposition is hereby ordered to ascertain and report whether the said act of Congress, approved April 25, 1890, is being complied with, and whether subsequent appropriations made for said Exposition are being judiciously expended, and whether the officers and employés are being properly and reasonably paid, and what amount of money has been expended by the United States Government, and the manner and necessity of such expenditure, and what additional amount, if any, is necessary to be expended, and what further legislation, if any, is necessary, and all other facts that may conduce to the protection and benefit of the Government of the United States and the success of the Columbian Exposition; and in order to make such report the committee is authorized to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and to present its report to the House of Representatives for consideration at any time.

The SPEAKER. To this substitute the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] offers the amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the words "on the Columbian Exposition" and insert the following:

"A special committee of nine members, who shall be appointed by the Speaker as a select committee."

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment presented by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] just read.

The amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBOROW].

The substitute was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the resolution submitted by the Committee on Appropriations.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SAYRES, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the original resolution will lie upon the table.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Mississippi to withhold that motion for a moment in order to allow the Chair to submit certain personal requests of members.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ALEXANDER, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. HOLMAN, upon the request of Mr. MARTIN of Indiana, on account of sickness.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. COOMBS to withdraw the papers relating to the claim of John T. Bruen before the Fifty-first Congress, there being no adverse report or vote thereon.

COMMITTEE RESIGNATIONS AND APPOINTMENTS.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BUSEY asks to be relieved from further service upon the Committee on the Eleventh Census.

Mr. M. A. SMITH asks to be relieved from further service on the Committee on Private Land Claims.

The SPEAKER. The requests will be granted, if there be no objection.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. TURPIE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Levenia D. Athon, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 2104) granting a pension to Mrs. Levenia D. Athon; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Bertha Test, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 2105) granting a pension to Bertha Test; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas M. Chill, praying for an increase of pension, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 2106) granting an increase of pension to Thomas M. Chill; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1878) to increase the pension of Ambrose B. Carlton, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SQUIRE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 616) for the erection of a monument and statue of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant on ground belonging to the United States Government in the city of Washington, D. C., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MORRILL. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report back adversely the bill (S. 51) to provide for the free coinage of gold and silver bullion, and for other purposes. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. MORRILL. I am also directed by the same committee to report back adversely the bill (S. 1269) to increase the circulating medium by issuing Treasury notes based on gold and silver coin and bullion, and to amend the coinage laws accordingly. I ask that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be postponed indefinitely, if there be no objection.

Mr. MORRILL. I am also directed by the same committee to report back adversely the bill (S. 468) to provide for the retirement of national-bank notes, the free coinage of silver, for the promotion of the international free coinage of silver, and for other purposes, with a recommendation that the same be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. MITCHELL. Would the chairman of the committee have any objection to permit those bills which have been reported adversely to go on the Calendar?

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that they be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the purpose for which I rose.

Mr. SHERMAN. The first bill reported, the bill introduced by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], was placed on the Calendar, and it is a bill similar in general framework and design to the others. It is only necessary to have one bill upon the Calendar. It will be open to amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can dispose of them the first time they are reached on the Calendar. We should like to look at them and see what they are.

Mr. SHERMAN. It will be an unnecessary printing to place them on the Calendar. The others are measures of the same character which have been indefinitely postponed.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can dispose of all the first time they are reached on the Calendar. I should like to look at them and see what they are. There may be some very material difference, although it may be apparently insignificant.

Mr. SHERMAN. All right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bills reported adversely will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them adversely, and moved that they be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to:

Mr. PLATT. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a memorial of the Centennial Board of Finance of Pennsylvania, praying for a dissolution of the corporation, to report in favor of granting the prayer of the petition and to submit a bill to accomplish that purpose. I ask that the bill may have its first and second reading, and be placed on the Calendar.

The bill (S. 2107) to enable the Centennial Board of Finance, incorporated by an act approved June 1, 1872, to close its affairs, and dissolving said corporation, was read twice by its title.

Mr. SHOUP, from the Committee on Indian Depredations, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the urgency deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 2108) to continue beyond his sixteenth year the pension of the insane son of Pryor Boatwright, late of Company D, Seventeenth Kentucky Infantry; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN. I introduce a bill, prepared at the Treasury Department, to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States, and for other purposes. The bill was framed in the Department with a view to carry out the provisions of the existing laws in regard to Chinese immigration. It is accompanied by correspondence which sets out the objects and purposes of the bill. I ask that the accompanying papers be printed with the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The bill (S. 2109) to prohibit the coming of Chinese persons into the United States, whether subjects of the Chinese Empire or otherwise, and to provide for registration and certificates of residence, and determine the status of all Chinese persons now resident in the United States, and fixing penalties and punishments for violation of this act, and providing for deportation of criminals, was read twice by its title.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio to state again the purpose of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill was prepared at the Treasury Department to enable the Department more readily and properly to enforce the provisions of the existing laws in regard to Chinese immigration.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator is aware that the Committee on Foreign Relations reported a bill covering that subject, which is on the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know; but that relates simply to the extension of time and not to details, which are set out in this bill. It is quite a long bill. As a matter of course, it will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the Senator will see it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, with the accompanying papers, which will be printed.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 2110) for the relief of Henry Halteman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SANDERS. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Montana to the fact that the Committee on the Judiciary reported a bill covering the entire subject of the sale of liquors to Indians in the Indian Territory, and that it is sufficiently comprehensive to include all classes of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. SANDERS. In that case I will ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I had contemplated that the Committee on Indian Affairs might examine it, possibly change it, and then ask to have it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, to which it would ultimately appropriately belong.

Mr. WILSON. I will state that before referring the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee to that committee I consulted with the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the bill to which I called attention has been reported unanimously by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Galusha A. Grow and Hon. Samuel J. Randall by the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 1604) to provide for the creation of a fourth judicial district in the Territory of Utah; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

REMOVAL OF UTE INDIANS.

Resolved, That there be reprinted for the use of the Senate Ex. Doc. No. 67 of the Fiftieth Congress, second session, and with it testimony taken for use of Committee on Indian Affairs at said session in relation to the removal of the Ute Indians.

TRANSFER OF REVENUE MARINE.

Mr. SHERMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to communicate to the Senate any information in his Department in respect to the expediency of transferring the Revenue Marine Service to the Navy Department and to express his opinion whether the public service would be promoted by such a change.

WEST VIRGINIA DIRECT TAX.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, several days ago there was passed by the Senate, in the absence of the two Senators from Virginia, the joint resolution (S. R. 9) to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the governor of the State of West Virginia the sum appropriated by the act of Congress entitled "An act to credit and pay to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia all moneys collected under the direct tax levied by the act of Congress, approved August 5, 1861." The succeeding day, at their request, I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed and moved to recall the joint resolution from the possession of the other House, to which it had been sent, the understanding at that time being that if requested by those Senators, after consultation, I would ask that the motion to reconsider be passed; that the joint resolution be reëstablished on the Calendar as Order of Business No. 74, and that it be laid for consideration before the Senate.

In pursuance of that agreement, I now ask unanimous consent that the motion to reconsider be agreed to, that the joint resolution take its place on the Calendar as Order of Business No. 74, and that it be now laid before the Senate for its consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and lays the joint resolution before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DOLPH. Has the resolution been referred to a committee and reported back?

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state to the Senator that the joint resolution has had the unanimous report of the Committee on Claims. It was on the Calendar for some time, and passed in the regular course of proceeding, and a motion to reconsider entered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I move to refer the joint resolution to the Judiciary Committee. This resolution, which was offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] and referred to the committee of which he is a member, was reported back to the Senate in an elaborate report made by him with the indorsement of the entire committee, is one that involves the relations of the Government of the United States as the holder of certain bonds signed by the State of Virginia in 1860, when both the States of Virginia and West Virginia were in the Commonwealth of Virginia.

It is a question of great financial interest to Virginia, involving, it may be, an expression of opinion on the part of the Senate which will apply to a much larger amount (running up into the millions) than that which West Virginia now asks to put into her treasury.

The question involved, apart from its pecuniary importance, is one that concerns two States and the Federal Government. In its legal aspect, if we regard that alone, it is a question of the highest dignity. The position which I occupy upon this subject is one which has been expressed by the Attorney-General of the United States in an opinion which I shall presently quote for the information of the Senate, and the report which was made by the honorable Senator from West Virginia is one which undertakes to override and to set aside the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States.

This, Mr. President, can scarcely be regarded as in the nature of a claim which should properly in the first instance have been referred to the Committee on Claims. There was no question as to the facts of the case and no fact for it to investigate. The mere question was whether or not the Attorney-General of the United States, who is the highest legal officer in this Government in an advisory relation to the President, should be overridden and an amount acknowledged to be due by the Government should be paid in contravention of his opinion.

This being the attitude of this matter, it seems to me patent that the appropriate reference in the beginning was to the Judiciary Committee, and I ask that that reference may now be made; that a tribunal entirely impartial passing upon a judicial question shall be that tribunal selected by the Senate for such purpose.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DANIEL. With pleasure.

Mr. MITCHELL. What is the legal question involved in this case, in the opinion of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. DANIEL. I will state the legal question involved, in the language of the Attorney-General, by reading his opinion to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. STEWART, I hope the Senator will be allowed by unanimous consent to complete his statement in regard to the pending matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? [No objection.] The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. DANIEL. The opinion of the Attorney-General, in a letter addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, D. C., August 12, 1891.

SIR: By your letter of April 13 last, you ask whether, under the law, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and required to retain the whole or any part of the amount due to the State of West Virginia on account of the refund of direct taxes, under the act approved March 2, 1891, by reason of the alleged liability of the State of West Virginia for a part of the indebtedness of Virginia prior to the separation and erection of West Virginia into a new State.

The constitution of West Virginia, which went into effect in 1863, declared that "An equitable portion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by this State; and the Legislature shall ascertain the same, as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within the period of thirty-four years." (Article 8, section 8.)

Upon this constitution the State of West Virginia was admitted into the Union.

The indebtedness of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, was, as I am advised, something over $30,000,000. I am informed by your letter that of this indebtedness nearly $1,600,000 was due to the United States, and that the same, with interest, remains mainly unpaid.

Section 3481 of the Revised Statutes of the United States reads as follows:

"Whenever any State is in default in the payment of interest or principal on investments in stocks or bonds, issued or guarantied by such State and held by the United States in trust, the Secretary of the Treasury shall retain the whole, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of any moneys due on any account from the United States to such State, and apply the same to the payment of such principal and interest, or either, or to the reimbursement, with interest thereon, of moneys advanced by the United States on account of interest due on such stocks or bonds."

In my opinion—

I call the attention of the honorable Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] to this, which states the question and gives the opinion of the Attorney-General upon it:

In my opinion, under this statute, it is your duty to insist upon the right of set-off against the demand of the State for a refund of the direct tax to the extent of the "equitable proportion" of the debt of Virginia for which West Virginia is liable. What this "equitable proportion" may be is not a question of law but of fact, or of mixed law and fact, and is not for my determination.

Very respectfully,

W. H. H. MILLER, Attorney-General.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. MITCHELL. As I understand, the Attorney-General there refers to the provision by which it was agreed that West Virginia should pay an equitable proportion of the debt of old Virginia whenever that should be ascertained. He says that is a question of fact with which he has nothing to do. That has not been ascertained, and the Senator from Virginia does not assert that this question of fact has ever been ascertained.

Mr. DANIEL. This resolution does not seek to ascertain it, and the legal opinion of the Attorney-General is that with that amount unascertained—though I maintain, further, that both States are liable for the whole amount—this measure should not be passed; but whether correct or not, I ask that this question shall be referred to the Judiciary Committee, the proper tribunal of this body, according to its rules, to pass upon those cases which present nothing but legal questions.

I may be permitted to say there are other grounds of statutory and international law upon which the Attorney-General might as well have predicated this opinion, and furthermore, while I criticise in no hostile spirit the report which has been made by the Committee on Claims, I beg leave to advert to the fact that in that report most substantial and important facts have been omitted from the recital, and one of them is this. It is commented upon by the Attorney-General of the United States that West Virginia came into the Union with a constitution which obliged her Legislature to assume an equitable proportion of this debt and to provide a sinking fund which in thirty-four years would pay it.

I beg leave to call attention to the fact that those thirty-four years have well nigh passed. West Virginia, which came into the Union with such a constitution, has never unto this day paid one dime upon that debt, nor ascertained what it is, in so far as I am advised, or if she has ascertained what it is, the amount does not appear in this report made by her Senator.

If there be a delinquency in the ascertainment of a debt which is due to the United States Government, and that delinquency is not the delinquency of the Government itself, shall it part with the assets which it holds in its hands on account of the delinquency of others?

Furthermore, I beg leave to call the attention of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Claims to the fact that while West Virginia came into the Union with this constitutional obligation imposed upon her Legislature, she has changed her constitution and has omitted that provision from it, an indication which you may interpret according to its necessary implication.

Furthermore, Mr. President——

Mr. MITCHELL. If the Senator will allow me, he will concede I think that there is nothing in this bill, if it should become a law, from beginning to end, that in any manner interferes with the relations now existing either by virtue of constitutional provision or agreement between the two States of Virginia and West Virginia in reference to the debt of old Virginia, or in reference to the equitable proportion which West Virginia may have to pay when that debt or amount is ascertained. There is nothing in this bill, or resolution I will say, that undertakes to decide that question or pass upon it directly or indirectly.

Mr. DANIEL. I am obliged to the Senator from Oregon for his interpretation of the bill which is now before us, and in response to his suggestion I beg leave to ask him a question. He states that there was a compact between the two States. He must mean that a compact between the two States was contained in the constitutional provision of West Virginia which is quoted in this report, does he not?

Mr. MITCHELL. I understand it is provided in the constitution of West Virginia which went into effect in 1863, that an equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, shall be assumed by the State of West Virginia.

Mr. DANIEL. That is what you refer to?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the provision of the original constitution.

Mr. FAULKNER rose.

Mr. DANIEL. I hope the Senator from West Virginia will allow me to finish my remarks in reply to the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. FAULKNER. I merely wish to say a word on this point.

Mr. DANIEL. I can not yield to my honorable friend at this time.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator does not want the facts, I can reserve them in my possession until he has concluded.

Mr. DANIEL. I wish the facts. The Senator is very much in error if he thinks I mean any discourtesy to him, but a gentleman can not possibly answer two at once. It only leads to a confusion of his ideas and to a confused presentation of them to the Senate.

Mr. FAULKNER. I wish simply to say, Mr. President, that I was going to answer the Senator's question and not to ask him one.

Mr. DANIEL. I should be very glad to yield the floor to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. FAULKNER. When the Senator has concluded his remarks on his motion I will take the floor.

Mr. DANIEL. I had not even concluded answering the question of the Senator from Oregon.

Now, Mr. President, with the assurance to my honorable friend that I shall be gratified, as soon as I have replied to a question which the chairman of the Committee on Claims propounded to me and ascertained what he means by it, to yield the floor to him for any other question, I beg now to say to the Senator from Oregon, who refers to a provision of the constitution of West Virginia as being part of a compact between West Virginia and the Government of the United States and between West Virginia and Virginia—do I correctly understand him?

Mr. MITCHELL. I merely referred to a provision in the constitution of West Virginia. I am not undertaking to decide what the compact is between the two States. What I said and what I repeat is this: Whatever that compact was, whether by virtue of constitutional provision or by statutory provision or by agreement between the two States, this joint resolution does not undertake directly or indirectly to interfere with it one way or the other. It ignores that question, it leaves it entirely out of consideration, and simply passes upon the single question as to whether the United States Government is justified in withholding the amount of the direct tax to which West Virginia is entitled upon any ground recognized by the statute which recognizes the right of set-off.

That is the only question passed upon by the committee, and that is all there is in the resolution reported by the committee. It leaves the questions, as I understand—if I am in error I wish to be corrected—as to the relations growing out of the separation of West Virginia from old Virginia entirely as they exist now, whatever they may be. It leaves that matter to be settled between the two States

Mr. DANIEL. Is the Senator aware that the State of West Virginia has repealed the constitutional provision to which he refers as part of the compact?

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not going into that matter.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask if the Senator is aware of that fact?

Mr. MITCHELL. I have nothing to do with that matter. I have said I care nothing about the relations between the two States. I have simply said that this joint resolution leaves that question entirely out of consideration and merely passes upon the single question as to whether or not under existing law the State of West Virginia is or is not entitled to her share of the direct tax under the law passed at the last Congress.

Mr. DANIEL. I can not precisely understand the Senator from Oregon. He referred in the first place to a provision in the constitution of West Virginia which appears in the report of the committee of which he is chairman, as fixing that the government of West Virginia was not bound for the entire debt under the international legal provision which is quoted in that report, but was only bound for the assumption of an equitable proportion according to her constitution. I ask him now if he knew that that constitutional provision had been abrogated, and the very thing which he has quoted, or his committee has quoted, as the basis of their opinion he says has nothing to do with it. Mr. President, if it has nothing to do with the question, and is yet quoted as the ground of action, it seems to me that the Judiciary Committee would be the proper committee to investigate it, and not one which has such views upon this subject as the Senator from Oregon.

I take up this report, which is made by the committee of which the Senator is chairman, and I see laid down in it the law of international regulation which maintains that both Virginia and West Virginia are liable for the entire amount of those bonds which were issued by the State in its entirety. I will quote from that, for it appears in this report:

A State neither loses any of its rights nor is discharged from any of its duties by a change in the form of its civil government. The body politic is still the same, though it may have a different organ of communication. So, if a State should be divided in respect to territory, its rights and obligations are not impaired; and if they have not been apportioned by special agreement, those rights are to be enjoyed and those obligations fulfilled by all the parts in common. (1 Kent's Com., 25.)

Mr. MITCHELL. What does the Senator read from?

Mr. DANIEL. I read from Kent's Commentaries, quoted in the report of the committee of which the Senator is chairman.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me right there?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is not the doctrine laid down in the very authority which the Senator quotes from——

Mr. DANIEL. I have not finished quoting.

Mr. MITCHELL. Allow me a moment. Is not that authority to the effect that where a sovereign State is divided and there is no agreement between the two portions of the State, then the doctrine is that each portion is liable for the debt; but where there is an agreement between the two portions of the old sovereign State then the rule is just the reverse?

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator interrupts me before I have finished reading the sentence of his report, when, if he will be kind enough to be a little patient, I would lay the whole matter before him and the Senate.

Mr. MITCHELL. Allow me to say one word. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] made the report in this case. I am not going to interrupt the Senator from Virginia again, but I hope the Senator who made the report from the Committee on Claims will have the privilege, as I have no doubt he will at the close of the Senator's remarks, to answer all that can be said upon the subject.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I continue to read from the citations of this report, as I was doing when the Senator made the remarks which he has just submitted.

Section 27: The case is slightly different where one State is divided into two or more distinct and independent sovereignties. In that case the obligations which had accrued to the whole before the division are (unless they have been the subject of a special agreement) ratably binding upon the different parts. This principle is established by the concurrent opinions of text writers, the decisions of courts, and the practice of nations. (1 Halleck's International Law, pages 76, 77.)

Mr. President, accepting this statement of international law according to the meaning and significance of it as quoted by the committee, I beg leave to say that not only has the Senator from Oregon this morning but as well the committee which has made this report to the Senate endeavored to place West Virginia within the exceptional and modified clause of the statements of law on the ground of this constitutional provision which I have cited; and that I do not misinterpret the argument of the Senator from Oregon, which is concurrent with the language of the report, I read now from the report of his committee:

What is known as the reorganized government of Virginia, on the 20th day of August, 1861, adopted "an ordinance providing for the formation of a new State out of a portion of the territory of this State," and in the ninth section of said ordinance it provides as follows in reference to the debt existing prior to the 1st day of January, 1861:

"The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all State expenditures within the limits thereof and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government since any part of said debt was contracted; and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the said new State during the same period."

The ordinance which is thus referred to by the committee is an ordinance adopted by what is known as the "reorganized government of Virginia" which occupied the territory of West Virginia, and which a little later transformed itself by a process unknown to the Constitution and to peace into the State of West Virginia. Now, the Senator from West Virginia states in his report, which the committee of which the Senator from Oregon is chairman has indorsed and submitted to the Senate:

This proposition of the reorganized government of Virginia was accepted by the inhabitants of that section of the State which subsequently formed the State of West Virginia by the adoption in its first constitution of the following provision:

"An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the 1st day of January, in the year 1861, shall be assumed by this State; and the Legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within the period of thirty-four years."

Then this report says, commenting upon that clause in the new constitution of the new State:

On the 31st of December, 1862, Congress passed an act in which it recited the consent of the Legislature of Virginia, the framing of the constitution of the State of West Virginia, its adoption by the voters of said State, and in the same act provided for its admission into the Union as a State.

I have examined the constitution of 1872; I have inquired of the Senator from West Virginia lest my examination might be misleading, and according to the information which I have received from the text of that constitution and the author of that report, every provision of the constitution of West Virginia which is relied upon by the Senator from Oregon as a part of the compact which takes this matter out of the provisions of international law has been abrogated, set aside, and repealed.

Furthermore, I need not go beyond the report which has been made by the Committee on Claims and the exhibits which it has laid before the Senate to see that the State of West Virginia today in this very report denies the obligation of that constitution which the Senator from Oregon relies upon as the basis for overriding the opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States.

Let the Senator turn to the copy of the report of his committee which he has before him, on pages 10 and 11, and let him read there the letter written to the Treasury Department of the United States by the present executive of that Commonwealth. In that letter, which is dated October 28, 1891, which is fresh from the office of the governor of West Virginia, I read this language:

We claim to owe Virginia nothing, and that we are not liable for any part of her antewar debt.

And yet, sir, with the paper before him and before this committee in which the executive of the Commonwealth declares that they claim to owe nothing, and in spite of the fact that with thirty-four years of constitutional obligation resting upon them they have not paid a cent, we are told in the Senate that the Treasury should turn over to them all that is owed because an equitable portion has not yet been ascertained.

Mr. President, the appropriate place for this joint resolution is before the committee on courts of justice. I beg leave to say that in my humble opinion this resolution has no place in the Senate.

I have before me the one hundred and twenty-third volume of the United States Court Reports, and I find that if the Senator from West Virginia is correct in his views of the law and the Attorney-General of the United States is wrong, there is a tribunal ready and open to them at all times, in which this question might ere this have been settled. I read from the case of the United States vs. Louisiana in the one hundred and twenty-third volume of the United States Reports, page 32:

The Court of Claims has jurisdiction of an action by a State against the United States for a demand arising upon an act of Congress.

Mr. President, if the Attorney-General is wrong, why is the Senate instead of the Court of Claims asked to overrule him? When the State of Louisiana had a question like this, involving the direct tax, it went from the Treasury Department to the Court of Claims and won it; and when the State of Georgia had a question like this before the Treasury of the United States it also went to the Court of Claims and won it; but when the Attorney-General of the United States has given his opinion that this claim of West Virginia is not tenable in law, not following the precedents by which Louisiana and Georgia had blazed the course of procedure, this case is presented here and the Committee on Claims, of which my honorable friend from West Virginia is an able member, presents a report written by himself, in which this opinion is overruled and Virginia is told that she should say nothing upon this subject.

Mr. President, I do not criticise with any asperity my honorable and able friend, nor do I criticise the State of West Virginia. She was the last child born of Virginia to this Union, and the confusion, the anarchy, the distress, and differences of opinion which arose between her people and those of the old Commonwealth I rather attribute to conditions which were unchangeable and which rested deeply in our social system than to any indisposition of her people to do the thing that is right and just.

For my State, however, it is not without some pride that I may recite the fact that, although it was the theater upon which a half million men fought during the period of four years of war, up to the present time she has paid $17,000,000 of interest upon her public debt; that in the feeble days after the war, when the sparks in ashes of her homes were scarce yet extinguished, she sent to the Government of the United States and paid the only interest which has ever been paid upon these bonds, and I do not think, sir, that it would be the correct treatment of that Commonwealth in her contention to have her overridden upon this floor when the provision to which the Senator refers has been ab-rogated from the constitution of West Virginia, and when her assumption of an equitable proportion of that debt is thirty-four years past due.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator permit me one question right there?

Mr. DANIEL. With pleasure.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does the Senator think that there is to-day a subsisting agreement between the two States by which West Virginia is to contribute an equitable proportion of the old debt?

Mr. DANIEL. Suppose I admit that, what good does it do the United States?

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator contends that this provision in the original constitution of West Virginia referred to in the report has been abrogated.

Mr. DANIEL. I have so understood.

Mr. MITCHELL. And he has argued that there was no understanding between the two States as to the indebtedness, and therefore the rule of international law comes in making each State liable for the whole debt of the old State. Now, what I want to know is this: Is there or is there not, in the opinion of the Senator from Virginia, a subsisting agreement to-day between the two States by which West Virginia shall or shall not contribute an equitable proportion of the debt of old Virginia when that is ascertained?

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator has asked me a question which it is not altogether easy to answer, but I shall be entirely frank in giving to him the best conceptions that I can form upon that subject. There is certainly not such a subsisting agreement as the one to which he refers to, because the constitution of West Virginia was different from the ordinances of the restored loyal government of Virginia, as it is called.

Furthermore, there may be a very grave question arising in this case as to the validity of the provision of the constitution of the restored government which undertook to speak for Virginia and in her name at a time when three-fifths of the people of Virginia were engaged in war and were excluded by a line of battle from even participating in the proceedings which were held in the name of that Commonwealth. If the Senator relies now not upon the constitution of West Virginia, which I understood in the first place to be the gravamen of his argument, but on the constitution of the Wheeling government of Virginia, which was adopted during the war through the agency of a mass meeting, called a convention by way of complimentary consideration, then I would say that that constitution was itself set aside and overturned by the reconstruction law of the United States, and it would be indeed a hardship to hold old Virginia by a constitution framed out in West Virginia to every obligation, and then to repudiate it and set it aside as to every benefit which it might possibly confer.

Mr. President, I shall also refer to a fact which does bear upon this question in so far as the Commonwealth of Virginia is concerned and which I have not as yet quoted. It is the provision in the constitution of Virginia which was adopted in 1869, the constitution under which we now live, by which it was provided:

> The General Assembly shall provide by law for adjusting with the State of West Virginia the proportion of the public debt of Virginia proper to be borne by the State of Virginia and West Virginia, and shall provide that such sum as shall be received from West Virginia shall be applied to the payment of the public debt of the State.

We must read carefully this provision of the constitution of Virginia to understand its meaning and effect. It is a very different thing for that constitution to be obligatory upon the State of Virginia and for it to constitute a compact with West Virginia, just as it is a very different thing for the constitution of West Virginia to constitute an obligation upon its people and for it to be spoken of as part of a compact with another. This constitution of Virginia, when it is analyzed and read, will not bear out, as I understand, the full force and effect of the construction which my learned friend and the Committee on Claims attribute to it.

> The General Assembly shall provide by law for adjusting with the State of West Virginia the proportion of the public debt of Virginia proper, to be borne by the State of Virginia and West Virginia—

That signifies nothing except a tentative effort to be made by the Commonwealth of Virginia to ascertain to what equitable proportion each might be bound in order that the obligation which bound both might thus be separated, dissevered, and divided—> and shall provide that such sum as shall be received from West Virginia shall be applied to the payment of the public debt of the State.

Mr. President, there has been no opportunity for the law of Virginia to provide for any portion that was paid by West Virginia into the treasury of the State, for to this day there has not the value of a postage stamp been paid. Furthermore, this was not a compact between Virginia and West Virginia; it was a mere matter of local regulation for the people of the State to show that they held forth the desire to separate an obligation which bound both, and to provide that if West Virginia should be paid anything from her treasury it should be immediately applied to that obligation.

Mr. President, Virginia puts herself in the attitude of readiness or attempted readiness to conform her conduct to any view which may be held respecting this obligation. If the United States Government held both States bound she was ready to take steps to pay her proportionate part; but if, on the other hand, it might be held that she alone was bound, and West Virginia chose to pay into her treasury a portion of the obligation to be given to the United States, she only provided the constitutional machinery by which it could be done; but in no event, in no aspect, can the Senator, as it seems to me, appropriately contend that this matter, which contemplated a settlement on one plan, which has never been carried out, shall preclude the obligations which exist to the United States Government.

Let us look at this question in the aspect which appropriately affects our relation to it, not as Senators of Virginia or of West Virginia, but as Senators of the United States. The committee contends in its report for two legal propositions and gives appropriate citations which seem to support them. The first is that—

> If a State should be divided in respect to territory, its rights and obligations are not impaired; and if they have not been apportioned by special agreement, those rights are to be enjoyed and those obligations fulfilled by all the parts in common.

Mr. President, can the Senator from Oregon, can the Senator from West Virginia, can any human being point me to any special agreement between Virginia and West Virginia by which the amount of this debt has been apportioned? On the contrary, to construe the matter even in the language of the Senator from Oregon, there has by no condition and by no interpretation been anything more than a general understanding that it should be apportioned and the equitable proportion of West Virginia ascertained.

Now, it is only when the equitable proportion has been ascertained—it is not when each has acknowledged that it owes an equitable proportion, but it is only when the apportionment has been made between the two that, according to the text which the committee itself cites, the obligation is dissevered.

Mr. President, let me say further that I think my learned friends of the Committee on Claims have misinterpreted the full force and effect of international law in another respect. Two obligors in a bond, two persons who owe the bond, can not separate and divide the obligation of the bond so as to release either one or the other, in whole or in part, from the whole of the bond, unless the obligee, who is the holder of the bond, consents to and acquiesces in the agreement; and if there had been any special agreement, as the Senator contends, between the States of Virginia and West Virginia—and I deny the fact—let him show where the United States Government has made itself a party to that agreement by which it is estopped from asserting the obligation of the whole bond against both.

The United States Government has never acted upon this subject save to accept into this Union as States of the Union the States of Virginia and West Virginia. In the first constitutions of West Virginia it was provided that she should assume an equitable proportion of the debt. Is that an apportionment of her equitable proportion of the debt, or is it an obligation to go about the apportionment of it? Shall a thing undone, which was commanded to be done, be substituted as a plea for a thing accomplished? Can two persons, apart and aside from their creditor, go and separate their obligation as to him and say what they will do to pay him, when he has never been a party thereto?

Mr. President, it is on the part of the Government of the United States that I speak. I am a Senator from Virginia, but I am a Senator of the United States. It is true—and I do not disguise the fact—that in the maintenance of that position which I think the Government of the United States should and ought to maintain, my State may perhaps get the incidental advantage of not having a creditor to pursue her alone when another is equally liable with her, just, for instance, as if the Senator and I were so unfortunate as to indorse the bond of a friend, or if I in a firm name were to obligate him and myself conjointly and separately to pay a debt, and if, perchance, the creditor were levying upon me who for thirty-four years had never paid a cent of that debt, while he had been struggling to do it and had paid $17,000,000, would the Senator say that because he and I had agreed to pay the debt and I had agreed to pay an equitable proportion, that the execution upon me, when I had paid nothing, should be released and that the whole burden should be left to fall upon him? Would he so advise his clients in the State of Oregon? I think not. If, on the other hand, he said to the creditor, "Here both of us are bound for this debt. I have done the very best that I could to pay and the other has done nothing. Now that you have got the lien of an execution upon him, I would prefer that you should not release it and come against me."

There, Mr. President, if you analyze this question by any principle of international law, by any principle of constitutional law, by the ordinary rules of practice which obtain in courts and among men, I can see nothing in it which would induce me to advise the Government of the United States to pay to either Virginia or West Virginia what was due them when she held a bond upon which the Committee on Claims say both are liable.

Let me call the attention of the Senator from Oregon to the fact that he does not deny the obligation of West Virginia upon this bond, but maintains it. It was made by the State in its entirety when every citizen and when every county was under one jurisdiction. He only contends that by a special agreement between the two the joint obligation has been absolved.

I say, in the first place, no such agreement has been made; and, in the second, that the United States Government is not a party to it, and that in view of the fact that neither Virginia nor West Virginia is paying up much upon this debt to the United States, it is not judicious to advise the Treasury to override the opinion of the Attorney-General and to release the only security on earth that it has got for any part of it.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator a question. What is the basis of the statement that there was an agreement between the State of Virginia and the State of West Virginia to apportion this debt? What are the elements now upon which that statement is based?

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, it has been a little difficult for me to discover, but as well as I could make out from the argument of the Senator from Oregon and this report, which passes very lightly over that very weak point in its presentation of this matter, it relies upon the constitutional provisions of Virginia and West Virginia as constituting an agreement between the two States—that is the substance of it—an agreement which is unexecuted, and to which the Government of the United States is not a party in any other sense than that it has admitted these two States into the Union with such provisions in their constitutions.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to ask the Senator if he has before him the constitutional provisions which are alleged to constitute the contract between the two States?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes, sir; I have them here, I will read, first, in response to the question of the Senator from Mississippi from—I said constitutions, but I should have said the ordinance of one State and the constitution of the other—from the ordinance adopted by the Wheeling Legislature, calling itself a Virginia Legislature.

Mr. GEORGE. For the purpose of this argument we will call it the Virginia Legislature.

Mr. DANIEL. The Virginia Legislature of that portion of Virginia which adhered to the Government of the United States during the war, the loyal Legislature, or restored government of Virginia, as it is sometimes called. That says, touching West Virginia:

> The new State shall take upon itself a just proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the 1st day of January, 1861, to be ascertained by charging to it all State expenditures within the limits thereof and a just proportion of the ordinary expenses of the State government since any part of said debt was contracted; and deducting therefrom the moneys paid into the treasury of the Commonwealth from the counties included within the said new State during the same period.

As to that, I wish my comment to be associated with the quotation from the constitution which undertakes to bind Virginia. Let me say that that constitution was itself overridden and set aside by the Government of the United States, and that we are now living under another.

Mr. GEORGE. Is that by the Virginia ordinance?

Mr. DANIEL. That is the Virginia ordinance.

Mr. GEORGE. And that was accepted by West Virginia?

Mr. DANIEL. By West Virginia. In the first constitution of West Virginia article 8, section 8, there is this provision:

> An equitable proportion of the public debt of the Commonwealth of Virginia, prior to the 1st day of January, in the year 1861, shall be assumed by this State; and the Legislature shall ascertain the same as soon as may be practicable, and provide for the liquidation thereof by a sinking fund sufficient to pay the accruing interest and redeem the principal within the period of thirty-four years.

That constitution of West Virginia has never been complied with by West Virginia. Furthermore, as I understand it, that provision of the constitution of West Virginia no longer exists, but has been abrogated in the constitution of 1872; at least I inquired of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] whether that was not true, and I have not been informed to the contrary.

Mr. GEORGE. Which preceded in point of time?

Mr. DANIEL. Virginia preceded West Virginia.

Mr. GEORGE. That was an ordinance?

Mr. DANIEL. An ordinance.

Mr. GEORGE. Now, I want to know where, when, and in what terms the State of Virginia accepted the proposition made by West Virginia, because it requires an acceptance to make a contract. Has the Senator read that?

Mr. DANIEL. I have read the language.

Mr. DIXON. We can not hear what is being said, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Chair states to Senators that the reporters are almost utterly unable to hear the colloquy which is now going on. Senators on the floor will please speak louder, and other Senators will please converse less audibly.

Mr. GEORGE. My understanding of a contract is that two parties get together and accede to the same thing, each promising the other to do the same thing, and if all that has been done by West Virginia and Virginia has been read by the Senator from Virginia, it raises not a very grave doubt, because it seems to me to be very clear there was no contract made.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I have never understood that any contract was made further than these constitutional provisions, and they constitute all the light that this committee has shown upon this subject.

I beg leave now, as I am about to conclude, to impress this point: If two States desiring to come into the Union, let us say Idaho and Nevada, for instance, were, in consequence of negotiations between the governments of those two States, to agree about an adjustment of a certain matter, I do not think that because Congress admitted them into the Union with a substantial contract between the two, the Government of the United States thereby made itself a party to the contract, which it simply recognized by the admission as subsisting between the two.

Furthermore, if that contract was one which related to a debt held by the United States which bound the two and by arrangements between them as two debtors, contemplated that each should provide for a portion of that debt, and they were thus admitted into the Union, I would not understand that the Government of the United States by admitting them into the Union with a contract to provide between themselves for a matter which was intregral in itself, could release the one that had broken the contract and provided nothing for the obligation to pay the whole debt for which it was bound. That would be a new version of law which I have never discerned in any text-writer that I have had the opportunity to read, and which I venture to say can find no justification in any municipal or international court.

One more item, Mr. President, that bears upon this matter. The statute of offsets, which the Attorney-General cites in his report as one which justifies him in advising the Government to withhold the sum of some $150,000 from the treasury of West Virginia, is contained in the Revised Statutes of the United States, and is a part of the general law of the land applicable to all matters of cross debts between States and parties and the Government. In the direct-tax law, however, which was passed at the last Congress of the United States, there is a particular provision of offset which, it seems to me, is different in its language from that which the Attorney-General has cited. It provides:

> That no part of the money collected from individuals—
> That is, of the direct tax—
> and to be held in trust as aforesaid shall be retained by the United States as a set-off against any indebtedness alleged to exist against the State, Territory, or District of Columbia, in which said tax was collected: And provided further, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be paid out by the governor of any State or Territory or any person to any attorney or agent under any contract for services now existing or heretofore made between the representative of any State or Territory and any attorney or agent.

The facts in this case are these, and they are, I think, innocently misstated by this committee. The committee says that under the provisions of the direct-tax act, from which I have just read, and which was passed at the last Congress—> that under the provisions of the same act there was paid from the treasury of the State of West Virginia its proportion—

I am mistaken in my citation. It was the direct tax of 1861 that I refer to.

> Under the provisions of the same act there was paid from the treasury of the State of West Virginia its proportion of the tax under said law, aggregating the sum of $153,978.75.

It also adverts to the fact that individuals in Berkeley and Jefferson Counties paid $27,328.18.

The amount which was paid into the Treasury of the United States by individuals in West Virginia, it has received in trust and has returned to them.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was trust money.

Mr. DANIEL. That was trust money, and that has all been returned. Now, then, as to the statement here:

> Under the provisions of the same act there was paid from the treasury of the State of West Virginia its proportion of the tax under said law, aggregating the sum of $153,978.75.

That is inaccurate. There was never, as I am informed and as I believe without having access to official documents, a dime paid out of the treasury of West Virginia into the Treasury of the United States of that direct tax, and yet I do not esteem it that the committee have intended to mislead the Senate. They made a shorthand statement, so to speak, a stenographic report of a number of facts which, in their judgment, was the equivalent thereto, but in the correlation of those facts, if they were all set forth I do not know but that other questions than those here before us might be presented.

It seems that the State of West Virginia incurred certain expenditures for the equipment and support of troops during the war. It came to the United States Government after the war, as other States did, and asked to be reimbursed. The Government of the United States at that time having a claim of some $150,000 against the individuals and lands of West Virginia, an understanding was entered into, an agreement doubtless made (but the committee have not shed the light of any official history upon the subject) by which the claims of West Virginia against the Government of the United States for the support and equipment of troops were offset by the $150,000; so that, while lawyers may argue that this was the same, the precise statement of facts as it is here in the report is incorrect, and here may arise a matter that may affect very materially the State of Virginia in this wise——

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me right there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield?

Mr. DANIEL. I do.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is it not a fact that the Treasury Department recognizes to-day that West Virginia is entitled to about $153,000 of the money refunded under the direct-tax law, and that the only objection that is made to the payment of the amount is that there is an outstanding claim of the United States? Is not that amount certified to the State of West Virginia?

Mr. DANIEL. I have never said it is not.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not understand the Senator's argument, then.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator would understand the argument if he understood the facts.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understood him to insist that the committee had not stated the facts correctly. All the committee has said upon the subject is that West Virginia is entitled to one hundred and fifty-three and some odd thousand dollars by virtue of the appropriation made in the refund act of last Congress. I thought that was the fact. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. DANIEL. I have never denied the fact which the Senator recites, but I am taking the statement of this report, that the direct tax, which is sought to be reimbursed, was paid into the Treasury of the United States out of the treasury of West Virginia. I have given both the Senator and the committee the benefit of a most frank relation of the circumstances, and was going on to explain why, in my judgment, the full history of the facts might develop a matter in which the old State of Virginia is interested in this wise: What is known now as West Virginia was territorially, except in an ideal sense, then known as Virginia, and there were two governments asserting the right to the name "Virginia."

There was a Confederate Virginia in Richmond, and there was a Union Virginia at Wheeling. This Union Virginia at Wheeling, in which were represented no counties but those which now constitute West Virginia, with the exception perhaps of Fairfax and Alexandria, Va.—that Union Virginia, thus to describe it in order that it may be at once recognized, took part with the Federal side during the war, sent troops into its armies, and there were upon fields of battle in Virginia regiments on the Federal side, and in Virginia regiments upon the Confederate side.

If the full history of this matter may be developed and if that Union Virginia, which first was metamorphosed into West Virginia, and then was continued and was finally recognized as Virginia by a movement of its government to Richmond—if that Virginia by her constitution, which is cited in this report, is to be taken to have made an agreement touching this debt which binds the Virginia of to-day, it may be that the Virginia of to-day into which that government was transformed may have a claim upon the United States Government for the equipment and for the supply of those troops which it sent out into the field in the name of the Commonwealth of Virginia.

All I seek or ask is that the legal status may be determined here and not left in the obscure position which, as I humbly conceive, the report of this committee may leave it; that we may be put in one place or another, and have our legal, constitutional, and equitable rights so defined that we may not be to-day interpreted as belonging to the Virginia over the mountains when it is against us, and another day as belonging to Virginia east of the mountains when it is against us; but that on the highest legal authorities which can be invoked ascertain the matter, our rights may be defined and we may receive them accordingly.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia being recognized by the Chair, he is asked to suspend for a time in order that the Chair may lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 1549) providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] will at least permit the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] to submit his remarks in response to what has been said on the other side.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I dislike very much to appear in the least degree discourteous but the bill which has been laid before the Senate has dragged its weary length along here for many days, and I am as tired of it as the Senate can possibly be. I am extremely anxious to finish it so that I at least can go to the consideration of other matters.

Mr. KENNA. I appeal to the Senator to allow my colleague to proceed, and at the conclusion of his remarks, if it appears that there is to be further discussion, we shall allow the matter to go over.

Mr. MANDERSON. Can we not fix a time when the debate shall close, at least for to-day, on the matter which has been pending?

Mr. KENNA. Let us proceed for a while, and if the Senator becomes impatient it can be laid aside and he can go on with his bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Senator need not wait for me to become impatient, for I have become that already. Suppose we say that the debate shall be limited to half past 2 o'clock.

Mr. KENNA. Then I will submit the proposition in the alternative, and say we will wait until the Senator from Nebraska shall become patient.

Mr. COCKRELL. Permit me to make a suggestion. At 3 o'clock, just one hour from now, memorial services are to be had or addresses are to be delivered that will prevent the completion of the printing bill at that time, and possibly the Senator from West Virginia and other Senators may get through with the discussion of this subject before that hour.

Mr. MANDERSON. I hope at least that I may get a half hour on the printing bill to-day.

Mr. COCKRELL. In the interest of economy of time, the pending matter had better be concluded.

Mr. FRYE. I should like to make one suggestion, and that is that if the Senator in charge of the printing bill will not allow the Senate to adjourn about 4 o'clock each day, there will be ample time to get through with his bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have resisted, I think, with such force as I ought to resist the almost unanimous desire of the Senate on a motion to adjourn at unreasonable hours, but the Senate has overruled me every day. Yesterday we adjourned at a quarter to 5 o'clock, and the only demand that I heard from any Senator was that we should run on for fifteen minutes more, and that the Senate overruled. But I do not want to waste any time. If Senators will proceed for half an hour, I will again make an effort to have the unfinished business laid before the Senate.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am satisfied that the Senator will be so interested in this question at the end of half an hour that he will not interrupt it.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Senator is always interesting, but there are other interests besides those of West Virginia before the body.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I have been somewhat surprised at the character of the discussion of this question by the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. I am frank to say that I regret many of the allusions he has made to the State of West Virginia, to me personally, and to the committee of which I have the honor to be a member. I should have thought that he could have gone into the discussion of a purely legal question without indulging in personalities which are necessarily disagreeable not only to those at whom they are hurled but also to the members of this body.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from West Virginia permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator may.

Mr. DANIEL. I beg leave to state that I was entirely unconscious that I made any remarks which might in the least be unpleasant or disagreeable to the Senator from West Virginia or to the committee. If I have made such, sir, it was unintentional upon my part, and I beg leave to assure the Senator that without even having it pointed out to me I shall instantly withdraw it. My desire and disposition was to speak as I feel, with the profoundest respect for him and the Commonwealth which he represents.

Mr. FAULKNER. Such a manly disclaimer should be met by me in the same spirit. I assure the Senator that I am delighted he has made this statement, and I accept this disclaimer in the same spirit in which it is made. My reference was to his remark in which he referred to the fact that this bill had been submitted to a committee of which I am a member, that by reason of a personal interest which I had as a representative of the State of West Virginia I was biased, and this was followed by the remark that he desired it transferred to a committee which would be impartial. The insinuation at least might have been drawn by the Senate that in the judgment of the Senator from Virginia the Committee on Claims was not impartial, and, by reason of the fact that I am a member of it, capable of passing impartially upon this question.

Mr. President, I shall oppose with all the influence I have as a member of the Committee on Claims the transfer of this subject to the committee named as a supervisory body in the Senate to the Committee on Claims. Sir, what are the questions which are continually coming before that committee? They are questions which involve the liability of the United States under the Constitution and laws of this country. They are important, they are vital often to the interests not only of the United States, but of the citizens of this country. And has it come to such a pass that when a question is presented of that character and submitted to the Senate and ordered by them to be referred to the Committee on Claims, that when that committee make a unanimous report, which report can be attacked and overthrown if improperly made, on the floor of the Senate, because it involves some legal question of importance in the judgment of the Senator from Virginia it should be transferred to another committee to supervise the work of the Committee on Claims?

I am satisfied that it will not be the sense of the Senate to so consider the Committee on Claims, who, with the exception of myself at least, are as able a body of lawyers as can be found on any committee, with perhaps the exception of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, in either branch of Congress. They have acted upon this matter after deliberate consideration, after earnest investigation, and they have made their unanimous report to this body. Now let Senators attack the report if they can, and overthrow the conclusions of that committee.

I wish to say further, Mr. President, that the Committee on Claims or the Senator who introduced the joint resolution are not responsible for having dragged into the United States Senate the question of the indebtedness existing between the State of Virginia and the State of West Virginia. This report is based upon legal propositions that eliminated from the consideration of that committee in passing upon the joint resolution which it favorably reported all questions of consideration as to the existence or liability of indebtedness between those two sovereign States.

In fact the very basis and foundation of the action of the Committee on Claims is that not the Treasury Department, not the Court of Claims, not the district or circuit court of the United States, nay, sir, not even the Federal Congress has the jurisdiction to interfere between two sovereign States and to demand a settlement of matters existing between those two sovereignties. That is the basis on which rests the report of the committee. That is the legal proposition upon which rests the favorable action of that committee in reporting this claim to the Senate.

Sir, I do not feel like being dragged into a discussion of the relations between West Virginia and the mother Commonwealth, a Commonwealth that I claim, as one of its sons, all its glories and its traditions as a part of the heritage of my people, a Commonwealth that I would not for anything in this world utter one word against that would reflect upon the integrity or the honor of her people, for it is at last the people who constitute the Commonwealth. But, sir, some things must be met. Some remarks must be answered when uttered here in the presence of the country by so distinguished an authority as my friend from Virginia.

West Virginia has not paid a dollar of the debt in thirty years. Has Virginia paid one dollar of West Virginia's debt in thirty years? I ask the distinguished Senator that question. Certainly not. Then no complaint should fall from his lips. By the funding act of Virginia she set apart $15,000,000 of the public indebtedness of Virginia, which was estimated to be one-third of it, as the proportion for the State of West Virginia, not to be paid by West Virginia to a creditor to whom she issued the certificates of $15,000,000 and who accepted those certificates, but to be paid by the Commonwealth of Virginia when a settlement had been made between the State of Virginia and the State of West Virginia, recognizing the principle which is embodied in her organic law that in controlling, managing, and settling the indebtedness of the State of Virginia, West Virginia had no concern as to that settlement, as to the method of its liquidation, as to the terms or purposes of its compromises, but that she, the mother Commonwealth, had the entire control, not only of the assets that were held there at the close of the war to meet the indebtedness, but of the entire settlement of the original liability as between herself and her creditors. Such was the provision which appeared on the face of those certificates.

I shall not undertake, because it is not germane to this discussion, to explain to the Senate and to the country what is not the country's business, the relations which have existed between those States and the efforts which one or both have made to settle and bring to a determination the question in dispute between them. I shall discuss this report from the standpoint of a lawyer, and I shall ask every lawyer and Senator present to follow me, that they may see whether the law embodied in the report is unsound.

There is one other question. My friend, the distinguished Senator from Virginia, is hypercritical. This report has made a mistake, he says, in stating the fact that there was paid from the treasury of the State of West Virginia $153,000, which amount is involved in this resolution. As I wrote the report I feel that, if there is an inaccuracy, I should admit it frankly to the Senate, and if the assertion of my distinguished friend is inaccurate I should demonstrate that inaccuracy to the Senate while considering this report. Is it not a play upon words, taking the facts as stated by the Senator, that in 1868 West Virginia presented a claim in its corporate capacity against the United States for $456,000 indebtedness due to that State for subsistence and military expenditures on behalf of the United States, and that claim of $456,000 was allowed to West Virginia in its corporate capacity; but, said the Secretary of the Treasury, "your State is assessed with $153,000 on account of that direct tax, and this assessment appearing on the books of the Treasury against the State I will pay your State the $456,000, less the $153,000 that the State owes under the direct-tax law of 1861."

Why, says the Senator from Virginia, is that paying it out of the treasury of the State? According to his view, if the money is not actually in the treasury of the State and can not be taken out and handed over but was in a bank and a draft given against it, I can not properly assert that it was paid out of the treasury of the State. That $456,000 was in the vaults of the Treasury Department of the United States Government, admitted by the Treasury to be due to the State of West Virginia. Instead of giving a draft upon it the Secretary of the Treasury simply says, "I will arbitrarily deduct that amount claimed to be due by the State, as shown by the books of the Treasury, from the amount and pay you the balance." That was the way the direct tax of West Virginia was paid in 1868.

I admit that as a question of law in 1885 the Supreme Court of the United States decided that the direct tax was not a debt chargeable to any State, but chargeable to the inhabitants thereof, and that therefore it could not be set off by the Treasury Department in the settlement of any debt due by the United States to any State that had not yet paid the direct tax. But that decision was rendered for the first time in 1885. This money was paid in 1868. The statute of limitations prevented the recovery of that money by the State of West Virginia. West Virginia stands in the equitable position before the Senate to-day that, under the decision in the case of Louisiana vs. The United States, found in 123 United States Reports, if it were not for the simple bar of a statute it would have the right to recover in the Court of Claims the $153,000 paid in 1868, without any appeal to the appropriation under the act passed last year to refund the direct tax. But, sir, the bar of a statute would now be a conclusive answer to such an action.

The next proposition that the Senator from Virginia urges is that the Committee on Claims have asked the Senate and Congress to overrule the opinion of the Attorney-General in reference to this matter. Senators giving me their attention will permit me to read a clause found in the report which is quoted from the decision of the Attorney-General of the United States:

> Under this statute it is your duty to insist upon the right of set-off against the demand of the State for a refund of the direct tax to the extent of the—

Now, remember, "to the extent"— > of the "equitable proportion" of the debt of Virginia for which West Virginia is liable. What this equitable proportion may be is not a question of law, but of fact, or of mixed law and fact, and is not for my determination.

What is the meaning and extent of the decision of the Attorney-General? "I do not know whether a dollar is due under this equitable clause of the constitution of West Virginia from that State to the State of Virginia, but if there is any equitable liability due under that clause you must ascertain the proportion of that equitable liability for which West Virginia is liable, and when ascertained you may set off the $153,000 due to West Virginia against that equitable proportion of the indebtedness which the Treasury Department ascertains to be due by West Virginia to the State of Virginia."

What position has the Committee on Claims taken as to that proposition? We do not take issue with the Attorney-General on the law he has announced, but the Committee on Claims reports to the Senate unanimously that there is no function or power conferred on that Department or instrumentality provided by which the Secretary of the Treasury can ascertain that equitable proportion of the indebtedness of the State of West Virginia, if any, to the State of Virginia. The Attorney-General, in his own letter addressed to the governor of the State of West Virginia, admits that that equitable proportion could not be ascertained even in the Court of Claims without making Virginia a party to that controversy, and as a lawyer and legal adviser of the Government he does not desire to take a position upon a proposition that was doubtful, and would not perhaps be sustained in court. He adds: "I have not examined whether Virginia can be made a party to that proceeding."

Mr. KENNA. If my colleague in this connection will turn to page 10 of the report he will see that the letter of John Wilson, the Third Auditor, in reference to the claim of 1861, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, sustains precisely what my colleague now advances. It is not a question as to whether the Third Auditor is a law officer or not; the question is if the Secretary of the Treasury, who had control of this matter, acted upon that statement and paid this money. The Third Auditor says:

> From this it is apparent that the adjustment of this question is a matter purely and entirely between the States, and depending upon debits and credits of which the accounting officers of the Government know nothing and which are entirely beyond their reach.

And upon precisely the position my colleague is now presenting the Treasury Department paid the money without any let or hindrance from Virginia or from elsewhere.

Mr. FAULKNER. That was the position taken by the Attorney-General. The committee hold, and I am satisfied there is no lawyer upon this floor who will question the correctness of that conclusion, that there is but one forum known to the Constitution and laws of the United States that can take cognizance and jurisdiction of a controversy between two sister States. The Constitution and the Federal judiciary act of 1789 gives the Supreme Court exclusive jurisdiction in such a case, and none will question the fact that unless brought there by the voluntary act of one or the other State even the Supreme Court of the United States could not in any way interfere as between these two States. That forum is open to either the one or the other, but until one or the other demands the exercise of the jurisdiction conferred the jurisdiction can and will never be exercised.

Could an equitable proportion of the indebtedness, under the opinion of the Attorney-General, I ask any Senator, be ascertained in any method known to an accountant without the power of process to bring before some court or the Treasury Department all the books of the auditor's office of Virginia running over a period of thirty-nine years, which under the basis of settlement of the indebtedness provided in the ninth section of the ordinance of separation between the two States must be the evidence of the debit and credit account upon which the equitable liability claimed against the State of West Virginia must be ascertained? Could it be ascertained except by taking into consideration all these questions? If this is true, how could it be found by the Treasury Department? How can you ascertain it in the Court of Claims? You could not do it unless Virginia was before the court, and this is legally impossible. If you seek to bind one, should you not bind both?

Under this view of the case the governor of the State of West Virginia, recognizing that this was a question between the State of Virginia and the State of West Virginia, which did not admit of the interference of any other party, stated to the Treasury Department and to the Attorney-General that he could not give his consent to any such proceeding in the Treasury Department or in the Court of Claims, as the court had no such jurisdiction, and consent could not have conferred it, as consent in no case can give jurisdiction.

Mr. President, I wish to read from page 12 of the report an extract to show how correctly I have stated the position of the Attorney-General where he states more elaborately in a letter addressed to the governor of the State of West Virginia his conclusions. He says:

> The only question before me, then, is, Does the right of set-off exist if a debt is found to exist?
>
> "If a debt is found to exist."
> And that question, under section 3481 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, I will, I think, have to answer in the affirmative.

He will have to answer what in the affirmative? That the right of set-off exists if a debt is found to exist. Somebody must find it; some authority must ascertain it; some forum or Department must adjudicate it.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FAULKNER. With pleasure.

Mr. DANIEL. It is the whole debt of West Virginia.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will come to the question of international law after a while, and will discuss the question whether West Virginia owes the whole debt. I will add here that this is the first authoritative statement from any representative of the State of Virginia that has ever asserted the claim that West Virginia owes the whole debt, and that she is liable to the creditors for the entire debt. With all of the magnificent, brilliant genius that has guided her destiny and given dignity and honor to the legal profession in that noble old Commonwealth, we learn for the first time to-day, thirty years after the division of the State, the fact that Virginia claims that West Virginia owes the entire debt. But I shall come to that question presently.

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him just there, I beg leave to state to him that while he was occupying the bench, and I was a member of the Legislature of Virginia, it was always held that both States were liable for the whole debt. It was not denied by Virginia that she was liable for the whole debt.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the distinguished Senator whether he was not a member of the Legislature of Virginia in 1871?

Mr. DANIEL. I was.

Mr. FAULKNER. The date of the passage of the funding act?

Mr. DANIEL. I was; and that proposition made in the funding act, against which I voted, was one made by the creditors of Virginia as a matter of compromise for the purpose of separating the obligation. But on the broad proposition that so far as the bonds were concerned they were both parties in 1860 and bound in that sense that they were both obligors legally bound by the bond; the international authorities have always held that.

Mr. FAULKNER. I would then ask the Senator from Virginia why did he set apart $15,000,000 of it and issue certificates payable by Virginia, but known on the market as West Virginia certificates?

Mr. DANIEL. By a proposition of the creditors it was brought to Richmond, and they being willing to accept it, legislation was urged to adopt it. That was all.

Mr. BARBOUR. And to release Virginia?

Mr. DANIEL. And to release Virginia.

Mr. FAULKNER. I beg the Senator's pardon, it does not release Virginia. There is no such provision in that bill. I ask the Senator further whether in that very funding act there was not inscribed upon its very pages what is now part of the law of the State of Virginia, a provision giving permission to the State of West Virginia to settle with the holders of certificates authorized to be issued under that act?

Mr. DANIEL. Undoubtedly.

Mr. FAULKNER. This act recognized the fact that it required the legislative authority of the State of Virginia to justify West Virginia in any attempt to negotiate with the creditors of the State of Virginia. By the legislative provision in the funding act of 1871 permission was given, a limited permission, to the State of West Virginia to negotiate with the creditors of Virginia as to a portion of the original debt. In passing permit me to say to my distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] that it did not require the formal acceptance on the part of West Virginia of the basis of settlement prescribed in the ninth section of the ordinance of separation.

Has he forgotten the fact that West Virginia was once part of the Commonwealth of Virginia, and that the territory now embraced within her boundaries could not be clothed with the attributes of Statehood under the provisions of the Constitution and laws except upon the terms and conditions prescribed by the mother State, and when those conditions were prescribed it required no formal assent? The creation of the State of West Virginia was an acceptance of the condition-precedent upon which Virginia authorized the formation of the new State from territory formerly embraced within her boundaries; that acceptance was the only acceptance required in law.

That ordinance was followed by what I may term an honest acquiescence by the State of West Virginia in its provisions by placing in her constitution the declaration that she would be liable for an equitable proportion of the public debt of the State of Virginia prior to 1st January, 1861. The people of Virginia in her organic law gave the construction to section 9 of the ordinance by providing that any indebtedness found to be due by the State of West Virginia to the State of Virginia should be paid—to whom? A creditor of Virginia? No. To whom then was this indebtedness, if any existed, to be paid? Under the very terms of the constitution which Congress approved, and under which Virginia was restored to her rights in the Union, it was provided that the money to discharge any such liability found against West Virginia should be paid to the State of Virginia in her corporate capacity.

Mr. DANIEL. The proposition was never accepted by Virginia.

Mr. FAULKNER. Accepted! It is your own constitution and the history and acts of your State from the day of the separation of the State until the Senator himself voted on the funding act of 1871 recognized no right upon the part of the State of West Virginia to interfere with the indebtedness existing prior to the separation. Not a single act of the Legislature of Virginia, not a single act of her governor, not a single act of her Representatives in Congress can be pointed to by which it can be shown that Virginia, until she expressly gave permission in the funding act of 1871 to West Virginia to negotiate with a portion of her creditors, ever claimed that West Virginia could participate in anyway in the settlement of the debt of Virginia.

It is a matter of history known to everyone here that very recently an important settlement of the Virginia debt has been made, acquiesced in by the bondholders, indorsed by the sovereign power, the Legislature of that State. Where has West Virginia had a voice in that settlement. She is to be liable, and yet has had no voice in any transaction regarding that indebtedness for thirty years. I think that public history settles the question that all parties and both States have acted under the clear statement in the ordinance of separation and in the constitution of Virginia, that whatever liability there was on the part of West Virginia should be paid into the State treasury of Virginia.

But, says my friend, the State of West Virginia (as I infer, at least, from his remarks) was trying to avoid some obligation that she assumed at the time she was admitted into the Union by the repeal of a constitutional provision. West Virginia stands among the galaxy of the forty-four States to-day without a dollar's indebtedness, except what may be found to exist on a settlement between the mother State and herself. Her constitution prohibits the creation of a dollar of indebtedness by her Legislature. There is but one exception to that provision, and that is she is authorized in the constitution of 1872–'73 to create a bonded indebtedness to pay any liability that might be ascertained to be due to the State of Virginia.

My friend thought that he was putting the State of West Virginia in a rather unenviable attitude before the Senate of the United States and the country when he insinuated that the repeal of a provision found in the constitution of 1863, which provided for the payment of an equitable proportion of the indebtedness due by the State of West Virginia prior to January, 1861, abrogated that provision and was equivalent to a repudiation of any liability whatever on the part of the State of West Virginia.

I assert, sir, that the men who composed the constitutional convention of 1872–'73 in the State of West Virginia were the equals in character, in patriotism, in honesty of any class of men who were ever brought together in a deliberative body. Those men assembled at that period to revise the organic law of the State of West Virginia; and they would never have placed that Commonwealth in the position of repudiating one dollar of the honest indebtedness of the State. Although that constitution prohibits the creation of a dollar of indebtedness except for casual deficits, which have to be made up within a very brief period, it provides in article 10, section 4:

SEC. 4. No debt shall be contracted by this State, except to meet casual deficits in the revenue, to redeem a previous liability of the State, to suppress insurrection, repel invasion, or defend the State in time of war; but the payment of any liability, other than that for the ordinary expenses of the State, shall be equally distributed over a period of at least twenty years.

Mr. DANIEL. What other previous liability was there?

Mr. FAULKNER. None, sir.

Mr. DANIEL. None but this?

Mr. FAULKNER. None but the liability that might fall upon the State by a settlement between the State of West Virginia and the State of Virginia. By that provision her Legislature is authorized to pay any liability whenever ascertained, and the power is given her Legislature to bind the honor and faith of her people by the issuing of bonds to the full amount.

Mr. DANIEL. What provision is there in the constitution as a substitute for the provision under which West Virginia was admitted into the Union?

Mr. FAULKNER. There need be no other substitute than the one quoted.

Mr. DANIEL. Is there a provision to provide a sinking fund to pay an equitable proportion of this debt? Where is there such a provision?

Mr. FAULKNER. There is another provision of the constitution that applies to all indebtedness and provides for the sinking fund to discharge at maturity any liability created by virtue of the provisions of the fourth section of the tenth article.

Mr. DANIEL. Then let me ask the Senator, has the Legislature within the thirty-four years ever carried out the provision of any of these constitutional clauses to create any sinking fund or to provide any amount on account of this debt?

Mr. FAULKNER. I regret that the distinguished Senator has asked me that question. I would rather that my lips should be sealed and this question remain unanswered. I do not want to go into the question as to the efforts made by the State of West Virginia to settle this liability with Virginia.

Mr. DANIEL. What has she done to carry out her own constitution? I do not ask what she has done with Virginia; I ask, has West Virginia carried out its own constitution, which imposed an obligation upon its Legislature?

Mr. FAULKNER. What obligation, Mr. President?

Mr. DANIEL. The one in that clause which obligates her to pay an equitable proportion.

Mr. FAULKNER. How was that obligation to be carried out and ascertained but by a settlement between the two States? And we could not obtain that settlement.

Mr. DANIEL. Your constitution does not say that.

Mr. FAULKNER. How can you pay the equitable proportion unless you have a settlement between the two States and ascertain what that equitable proportion is?

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator has claimed that the constitution of Virginia, the ordinance of Virginia, fixed the basis of the calculation. If it fixed the basis of calculation, you had nothing to do but to apply the calculation to the basis fixed.

Mr. FAULKNER. Then I must go further and tell all the facts, as the Senator insists upon it.

Mr. DANIEL. I have no objection to your stating any facts.

Mr. FAULKNER. It was impossible to get the two States together upon the same basis. Commissioners at one time were to be appointed by Virginia. We accepted that proposition, but when we went to Richmond to meet the commissioners of Virginia they had changed it to arbitration, and our Legislature had adjourned, and we could not agree to this mode of settlement.

Mr. DANIEL. You mean when our commissioners went there.

Mr. FAULKNER. No, when our commissioners went there. Then, when we went a little further, we found that the funding act had been passed, and $15,000,000 of this debt had been set aside, only payable after a settlement between the two States, by the State of Virginia. We found then there was very little urgency on the part of our neighbor in bringing this question to a conclusion. Under these circumstances, when that was so, I answer now further the statement of the Senator, with this obligation on you, why did you not go on and settle your equitable proportion upon the information in your possession on the basis of the ordinance of separation?

Mr. DANIEL. The constitution prevented.

Mr. FAULKNER. I——

Mr. DANIEL. If the Senator will allow me; he asked me a question, let me answer. That whole constitution was set aside by the United States Government.

Mr. FAULKNER. This is the question the Senator has propounded to me: Why did not the State of West Virginia then go on with this basis of settlement before it, with the facts that ought to be in its possession, and make this equitable settlement?

As a last resort, and with an honest desire to vindicate the integrity and bona fides of her people, her sovereign power, that could alone act for her, did go to work, and when refused the books and other data, from the best information they could obtain through a committee of her Legislature they ascertained that, instead of a liability under the terms of the ordinance of separation existing against the State of West Virginia, there was a balance due to the State of West Virginia from the State of Virginia of $525,000. That may seem strange to you, Senators, who have not gone through with the account. Under the terms of the ninth section, every figure upon which the statement rests could be laid before the Senate; but I only mention it as a vindication of my people, and as evidence that they were acting with perfect bona fides in making this ex parte statement, on the refusal of Virginia to meet her commissioners and make this settlement. I wish to say further, before I close this question on the opinion of the Attorney-General, that he uses this further language:

Whether there is such a debt, and, if there be, what may be the amount, are questions with which I have nothing to do.

I add that the Committee on Claims have simply held as a legal proposition that as it involves intricate and complicated accounts between two States, and that under the opinion of the Attorney-General only an equitable proportion of the indebtedness could be held against West Virginia, there was no form by which the Treasury Department could ascertain the equitable proportion of the indebtedness of the State of West Virginia. But my friend, with his tenderness for the feelings of the Attorney-General, with that deep anxiety to see the law officer of the Government upheld in all his legal rulings in the interest of the Government of the United States, said, you should not act contrary to the judgment of the Attorney-General in this matter.

In the first place, the Committee on Claims have not acted contrary to his opinion. They have simply found that the Treasury Department could not ascertain the fact which he says is essential before the set-off could be allowed, but the next moment my distinguished friend turns around and says the Attorney-General does not know anything about the law; that instead of its being true, as the Attorney-General declares, that West Virginia only owes an equitable proportion of the indebtedness of Virginia, West Virginia owes all the debt of Virginia existing prior to the separation. My friend ought to hang on one horn of the dilemma or the other. He ought not to be willing to overrule the judgment of the Attorney-General when it conflicts with the interest of his State, but feel horrified to do so when it is to the interest of his State.

Mr. SAWYER. I ask the Senator from West Virginia if he will not give way, as it is very near 3 o'clock, so that we may have a short executive session?

Mr. FAULKNER. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SAWYER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Before putting the question on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin the Chair will lay before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives for reference.

Mr. SAWYER. I withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate will continue the consideration of this measure in the morning hour to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PASCO. By consent of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER], I ask that the bill (S. 1393) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the statutes in relation to immediate transportation of dutiable goods, and for other purposes," approved June 10, A. D. 1880, by extending the privileges of the first and seventh sections thereof to the port of Fernandina, Fla., to be taken from the Calendar and recommitted to the Committee on Commerce. I make this request with the consent of the chairman of that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SAWYER. I renew my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

DEATH OF THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE HOUK.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that the resolutions from the House of Representatives in relation to the death of Leonidas C. Houk, late a Representative from the State of Tennessee, be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays the resolutions of the House of Representatives before the Senate. The resolutions will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended, that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. Leonidas Campbell Houk, late a Representative from the State of Tennessee.

Resolved, As a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, and in recognition of his eminent abilities as a distinguished public servant, that the House, at the conclusion of these memorial proceedings, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask for their present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. Leonidas Campbell Houk, late a Representative from the State of Tennessee.

Resolved, That the business of the Senate be now suspended, in order that fitting tribute be paid to his memory.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect, the Senate at the conclusion of these ceremonies do adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, we are again called upon to pause in the performance of our legislative duties in order that we may pay the last tribute of respect to the memory of a deceased colleague.

Leonidas C. Houk, for twelve years a Representative from the Second district of Tennessee, and a member elect to the present Congress, departed this life at his home in Knoxville on the 25th day of May, 1891.

He was born on the 8th day of June, 1836, in the county of Sevier, in the mountain region of East Tennessee.

In the poverty and obscurity of his early life his boyhood was devoted to learning the trade of cabinet-maker, which deprived him of all the ordinary educational advantages.

But with maturer years came an ardent desire for knowledge and to better his condition in life, which prompted him, while devoting his days to the manual labor of his trade to devote the greater part of his nights to earnest study. And in this way he acquired an average English education.

Then, while yet following his trade, he commenced the study of law, and was finally admitted to the bar, and commenced the practice.

His severe application, perseverance, and intense earnestness of purpose soon secured him rank in the profession, and his ability and ingenuity in debate not only gave him a measure of professional success, but secured to him also a degree of prominence in the politics of the surroundings of his mountain home.

Early in the civil war of 1861–'65 he became a volunteer in the Union Army, and not long thereafter he was promoted to the command of the Third Tennessee Infantry Regiment.

In 1864 he was the elector for his district upon the Presidential ticket of Lincoln and Johnson.

In 1865 he was a member of the constitutional convention of the State.

In 1866 he was made judge of the judicial circuit in which he resided.

In 1868 he was a delegate to the Chicago Republican National Convention, and has been a member of all Republican national conventions, but one, since that time.

In 1873 he was elected to the State Legislature, where he became the recognized leader of his party in the house.

He was elected to the Forty-sixth, Forty-seventh, Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, Fiftieth, Fifty-first, and Fifty-second Congresses, but in the maturity of his intellect and full vigor of his physical manhood he was, on the 25th of May, stricken down and suddenly passed away.

Mr. President, even under institutions such as ours, where the humblest citizen may properly aspire to the highest positions within the gift of a self-governing people, the career of Leonidas C. Houk was remarkably successful. Born and reared in poverty and obscurity, and compelled to devote that portion of his life to manual labor which is usually devoted to acquiring at least the rudiments of an education, a laudable and earnest ambition to better his condition and rise in the world prompted him to burn the midnight lamp in the effort to educate himself, in which he succeeded, not to the point of scholarship, but to the extent of such practical education as enabled him, with his strong practical common sense, sleepless energy, and ambition, not only to take respectable rank in the legislation of the country, but to acquire an influence in and control of the district he represented that no one before him had been able to do.

Mr. President, success under such adverse circumstances is worthy of most honorable record.

There were, perhaps, no two men in Tennessee who differed more widely upon political questions than Mr. Houk and myself, and growing out of these differences of opinion our personal relations were not always kind, but in the presence of death all differences, political and personal, are hushed into silence and forgotten.

While he was in politics an able, active, earnest, aggressive, and bitter partisan, in social life he was kind, genial, and generous. In his death his party in the State lost its most efficient leader, and his party throughout the South sustained a loss almost if not quite as great, for he was justly regarded as one of the most able and efficient Republicans of the Southern States, whose opinions largely influenced, if they did not actually control, the action of his party throughout that section.

But his life's work is finished. His struggles, political and personal, are ended. May his ashes rest in peace.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the duty the living owe to the dead is to be kind to their faults and generous to their merits; to be truthful always, but with charity and loving kindness. We do not fight over the grave, but in view of the common fate that awaits us all, we scatter flowers, pronounce eulogies, and shed tears when our companions precede us to the inevitable bourn to which we must soon follow. Sometimes it is urged that the pressing demands of the living do not justify us in suspending for a time our public duties to pay fitting tributes to the memory of an associate who dies. I do not think so. The time is not wasted when we note and record the impressive lesson so frequently given us of the brevity and uncertain tenure of our life here, the vanity of human ambition, and the utter insignificance and speedy oblivion of the greatest amongst us when the spark of life is extinguished. On occasions like this resentments are forgotten, party feeling dies away, and each surviving member turns from the open grave with a chastened spirit, better fitted to perform the important duties and obligations he owes, not to his party, but to his country.

The death of Leonidas C. Houk, of Tennessee, brings before us one of the striking actors in the events of the most important period of American history. The civil war will always be regarded in future ages, whether viewed from the North or the South, by our own or foreign nations, as one of the memorable epochs in the history of mankind. It is now so far distant from us that even those who participated in its bloody battles, or its grave and difficult civil problems, can look back upon them with calmness and moderation. I do not see how the war could have been avoided. Its seeds were planted in conditions that existed before the Revolutionary war. They were recognized and pointed out by the framers of the Constitution, but even their wisdom could only postpone the evil, but could not find a remedy. These elements of discord cropped out in every stage of our growth, and gave birth to parties and sectional divisions. They arrayed State and national governments against each other, and ripened into open warfare free and slave institutions.

It was beyond the power of poor, frail human wisdom and forbearance to peacefully reconcile these opposing elements into a harmonious union. A peaceful voluntary separation would have been a hollow truce and only an incitement to a greater war. It would have sanctioned the doctrine of despotisms, that republics were only born to die. If war was to come it was better that it came when it did, when the recollections of a common but glorious history and the ties of a common origin, language, and religion, and the wonderful growth and development of a great country by the common efforts of both North and South were the mystic cords that still held us together and pleaded for union in spite of slavery and opposing views of State and national authority. The war came, in which both sides proved their courage and endurance. In spite of the fearful loss of life and property, of the great pension rolls, of the wounded and disabled, and of widows and orphans, we can all agree, without passion or irritation, that the civil war has secured to the innumerable throng that will follow us the blessings of a stronger government than was possible before, freed from the grave contentions of the past. The people of every State and section and class will in due time have their full share of these benefits. We may now all hope for a perpetual Union of indestructible States, in which the people, all free, are the source of all power, whether exercised in the smallest school district or municipality, or in the numerous States, old and new, or in a Federal Government of limited but ample powers over the better part of a continent.

In this great struggle Mr. Houk was a humble but not an insignificant actor. He was born and bred in the mountainous region of East Tennessee where love for the Union was the dominant sentiment. Though the State of Tennessee had formally adopted an ordinance of secession, yet the majority of the people of East Tennessee rebelled against this secession. In most of the States, North and South, when the lines were drawn the minority acquiesced and the battle was fought on sectional lines, but not so among the brave mountaineers in East Tennessee. With them it was not a territorial war; a war between sections; it was a civil war, dividing communities, neighborhoods, and families, a war more desperate and cruel than modern war between nations. Mr. Houk enlisted in this war for the Union against his State. Born in poverty, of humble parentage, without aids in education, he had passed through the trying ordeal of self-education, learning his letters and pouring over his books by the pine torchlight, working at his trade as a carpenter, studying law in the hours of rest, admitted to the bar, and steadily maintaining in intellectual contests the cause of his clients.

This was the early experience of many of the greatest men who won their way, especially in the South and West, to the highest rank among statesmen, soldiers, and lawyers, and to the greatest success among scientific, professional, and business men. So numerous have been these examples that we have come to regard such obstacles as the necessary incentives to exertion and success, and the result is the best fruit of American institutions. Certain it is that no one ever won the measure of his success over greater difficulties than Mr. Houk. When he entered the Army he had attained a respectable position at the bar of his native district. On the great question of secession or union he had no doubts, but took his position, with a majority of his neighbors, against his State. He soon commanded a regiment in the Union army, and served as such until April, 1863, when he resigned on account of ill health. He afterwards took an active part in the reorganization of the State government of Tennessee, resumed the practice of law, was several times an elector for President, was a member of the convention that amended the constitution of Tennessee, and served as a judge for years. He was elected as a Republican member of Congress in 1880, and re-elected to each successive Congress to the present time by the same constituency. He died before he could enter upon the last term for which he was elected.

This brief epitome of a life, active and varied in peace and war, from humble poverty to assured success, long trusted by a people among whom he was born and who knew him best, prematurely cut off by death at the age of 55, before his mental or physical faculties had begun to decay, is but the faint shadow of the rugged experience, character, and personality of Leonidas C. Houk. I came to know him well in his later years. He often came to me for my opinion and advice. Why, I do not know, but presume it was because we, in the main, agreed. He was strong, earnest, and honest in his view of the powers and duties of the National Government. He believed in protection, improvements, development, and progress as these words are used in political creeds. He had no jealousy of sections or States, but only insisted that Tennessee should have its full share of the blessings that come from national authority, whether in the form of offices or tariff protection or appropriations.

In late years his mind was full of the enormous mineral resources of East Tennessee, of its developed and undeveloped wealth. He loved the mountains among which he was born, and was proud that their hidden treasures were being revealed at a time when his people would be most benefited by them. He was always true to his constituents, a champion of his people, faithful to every representative duty. He was bold and aggressive in maintaining their rights, but generous to his adversaries and prompt to secure to them their restoration to the elective franchise and to all the rights of citizenship. The hearty expressions of respect that have been said of him here and in the House of Representatives by his enemies in war and his political adversaries in peace, are the best evidence of his manly and generous traits. Let us hope also that this kindly appreciation of the merits of the great actors in our civil war, whether on the Union or Confederate sides, may be continued and expressed until the last one has met the common foe, when a new generation may impartially cherish a just pride in the courage and heroism of their ancestors, and expend their energy in the peaceful development of a free and great Republic committed to their care.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I can not allow this sad occasion to pass without saying a few words expressive of my appreciation of the life and character of Judge Houk and of my sorrow on account of his death. It was my good fortune to be intimately acquainted with him, and my admiration for his sturdy qualities became stronger as I knew them better. He was a warm-hearted man, fond of his friends, and had an undying devotion to his party, his country, and its flag. His nature was full of enthusiasm, and all through his life no man who knew him ever doubted Judge Houk's position or belief on any public question, for he reached conclusions quickly and was quick to avow them. While he was brave and determined, he was equally generous. Brave men are seldom found to be unfair in dealing with their adversaries.

As has been related by the honorable Senator from Tennessee, he was a Union soldier, and was seven times elected a member of Congress from his district. No man was braver in war, and none displayed a greater devotion to the interests of the people of his district or State. It became my sad duty, Mr. President, to attend the funeral of Mr. Houk, and the occasion was a solemn one indeed. As has been stated, he was a resident of the beautiful city of Knoxville. On my arrival in that city in the morning of the day of the funeral services, I found business suspended for the day, and a universal recognition of the sad event in and along the streets of the city in all directions. The plain people, as the great body of the people were once designated, I believe by Mr.

Lincoln, toward midday filled the streets. They had come by railroad, in wagons, or on horseback, for many miles, and, on inquiry by me, from whence and how far they had come, I was told that many had come on horseback 40 miles and more. The equal of the demonstration of grief on account of the death of Mr. Houk has been seldom witnessed in this country on other like occasions.

The people all knew him. They knew him as a boy, as a private citizen, as a lawyer, as a soldier, calling upon the brave men in the valleys and hills and mountains of Tennessee to come to the rescue of the Union and the flag, and he had led many of them in battle to victory and had suffered with them defeat. They had known him as a judge upon the bench, and finally as their Representative in Congress. He had done something for them all at some time. His life was a part of theirs. His death was a sad and terrible blow to them, and sorrow entered into every household in all that region of the great State of Tennessee.

Mr. President, men die, their mortal remains are carried to the tomb, and their names are soon forgotten, because they have done nothing to place the world under obligations. They leave the world unhonored or unsung. Not so with the deceased whose life and character we commemorate to-day. He had spent a life in doing acts of kindness to the poor and the needy of his district and State, and as a legislator had done great service in securing general legislation in the interest of the business and commerce of Tennessee. He believed in the foundation principles of liberty; he believed in the Union, and that it could not be dissolved except by revolution too powerful to be successfully resisted, and he fought in the line of his convictions.

The world is placed under obligations to a man for great thoughts, great deeds, or great devotion to principle. This country, Mr. President, owes a debt of gratitude which can never be paid for the courage and devotion which he displayed in behalf of the Union and the principles of free government.

Men have their faults and failings—who can say that he has none?—but the man who improves the condition and happiness of one life struggling against adversity, and in the shadows of despair, is a benefactor of his race. The life of Judge Houk was replete with acts of kindness and noble deeds, even to the almost entire neglect of his own interests and comfort. He was generous, brave, liberty-loving, and patriotic. His remarkable career has ended, and we can do no less than to express briefly to the world our estimate and appreciation of his qualities as a man, as a citizen, as a soldier, and as a statesman, now that he is gone.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in the presence of death we stand awe-struck and powerless. Its mystery and its meaning are alike beyond human reach and human comprehension. We are born, we live, we die, and there the story ends so far as this life goes; but beyond this life, concerning which faith directs the mind and belief illumines the heart, we look for a better, a sweeter, and a more enduring world. But here death comes to all. The blow falls whether or not we are prepared for it. It is no respecter of persons, but comes to all classes and conditions of men.

The great questions of life, death, and immortality challenge the thought and overwhelm the imagination. Philosophers and sages alike stand in awe as they contemplate the plans and purposes of the Unseen. Speculation is lost in the realm of doubt, and the limitations of human knowledge are on the border line of the beyond. After all, we can but realize that—

> The will of God is all in all. He makes,
> Destroys, remakes, for His own pleasure all.

Good Bishop Hall teaches that "Death borders upon our birth, and our cradle stands in the grave." Bacon says "It is as natural to die as to be born;" and while Byron declares that—> * * * it is a fearful thing

> To see the human soul take wing, with what comfort can we turn to the words of our own Longfellow:

> There is no death! What seems so is transition:
> This life of mortal breath
> Is but a suburb of the life elysian,
> Whose portal we call death.

On occasions like this, when we recall those who have passed from our sight—whose activities are hushed and whose spirits have departed—we comfort our own hearts and extend words of cheer rather than sorrow to those who are bereaved, in the thought that "there is no death," in the consolation of a future life, and in the assurance of a better world than this.

I had no knowledge of the home life of Leonidas C. Houk. I knew him only as a public man, being associated with him in the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses. There I saw much of him, and our relations were more than ordinarily friendly. He impressed me as being a whole-souled, kind-hearted, earnest, honest man. Representing a district that gave him from ten to twelve thousand majority, he was proud of his constituency, and devoted to his people. In debate he was strong. His language was vigorous, his ideas clear, and his knowledge of public affairs comprehensive and just. He was frank, outspoken, and sincere—an able man, a good friend, and a loyal defender of what he believed. Judge Houk was the acknowledged leader of his party in Tennessee, presiding at conventions, dictating nominations, and shaping platforms. In political life he was aggressive, perhaps sometimes autocratic, but through a long series of years he held the confidence of the party in his State, and no political gift in their power to bestow would have been withheld from him.

And so to-day we bring our tribute of love and place it on the grave of our dead friend. It is the last and only offering we can bring. His genial presence is missed. His kindly greeting is no more heard. His tumultuous spirit is forever at rest. His faults will be forgotten, while the memory of his virtues will remain with those who knew him, and the excellent qualities of his character will be a help and an inspiration to those he left behind. And it will be well for us all, remembering the suddenness of our friend's death, to adopt the words of Jeremy Taylor; "He that would die well must always look for death, every day knocking at the gates of the grave; and then the grave shall never prevail against him to do him mischief."

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, "Thy scythe and glass, O Time, are not the emblems of thy gentler power." The sands run fitfully and swiftly through thy glass, and thy scythe cuts its broad swath by day and by night, and never wearies reaping its harvest of death. In doing so, it claims alike for its victims the young and old, the grave and gay, the exalted and the humble. In its relentless demands it recently invaded again our national Legislature, and laid claim to the Hon. L. C. Houk, of Tennessee, one of the most prominent and influential members of the House of Representatives. He was taken from the activities of life in his ripe and healthful manhood; at that period when his intellectual vigor was at its greatest strength; at a time when he was master of a field of political operations from which he had practically driven competition; at a time, too, when holding a seat for the seventh successive term in Congress, where he had made an extended reputation, and where the future to him was more inviting than ever.

After the adjournment of Congress last spring Judge Houk returned to his home in East Tennessee to enjoy a respite from official labors among those friends whose confidence and affection had for so many years been unwavering, and where alone in the bosom of his family could be found that sweet and quiet domesticity so soothing to the public official after the turmoil and strife of a Congressional session.

When Judge Houk was thus surrounded, and at a moment when least expected that dread messenger, which stops not and relents not, came suddenly—swift as the sped arrow from the bowstring—and claimed him as a victim.

Judge Houk was a man of characteristics, the features of which were boldly and strongly marked. He was a man of convictions, and those convictions were of the most pronounced type, and showed forth distinctively, alike in peace and in war, in the quiet walks of life and in the national forum, representing those whom he loved and who loved and honored him.

Mr. President, living in the same State with him, and belonging to opposing political parties, I but do his memory justice when I say he was the most efficient political leader known to the history of the Republican party in Tennessee. In its councils he was wary, and his advice was always given with caution, which added much to his influence and control; but when the campaign was rife and the battle on, he was its Ajax Telamon.

Astute, quick to perceive and understand the situation, he was bold and fearless in taking advantage of it. Judge Houk was a dangerous political adversary; one who could command his resources and put them in shape with wonderful facility. His capacity and power for handling his resources in a political encounter have been shown no less in contests with party opponents than with rivals in his own camp. His forte was on the hustings, where, with the exercise of rare good judgment, bottomed on a practical everyday knowledge of human nature, he always commanded attention. With fluent speech, abounding in ready retort and happy illustrations; with a humor that often broadened into the ridiculous, whenever it pleased his audience for him to do so, and all guided by a self-possession that never deserted him in debate, made him, among the people with whom he had been brought up and with whom he was in political touch, almost invincible.

He was born and reared in the shadows of the mountains and the sunlight of the valleys of that Switzerland of America, East Tennessee. Being a native of the district he so long represented, his constituents knew his virtues as they did his faults. He was but human, and had follies and faults. Who has not?

"Poor race of man," said the pitying spirit,
"Dearly ye pay for your primal fall;
Some flowerets of Eden ye still inherit,
But the trail of the serpent is over them all."

Of humble origin, with poverty as a heritage, and at a tender age, Judge Houk was left without a father's arm on which to lean or hand to guide; with few facilities for education—indeed none save such as he himself created—he started on life's voyage. The way seemed dark and his equipment poor, but with talents and courage he dissipated the darkness and blazed his way to the open field where the sunlight invited prosperity. Thus we see him, from humble life, without means, without influential friends, and comparatively uneducated, battling with iron fortune until he held place in the front rank, where intellect, culture, fortune, and family influence held sway.

At the bidding of his people Judge Houk was, by turns, State legislator, Presidential elector for his party, president of his party's State convention, delegate to his party's national conventions, judge of the circuit court of his judicial district, and Congressman for thirteen consecutive years, dying with his official harness on.

His long retention in office as the Representative in Congress of the same district, his native one, is the highest tribute that can be paid to his memory. This district he made a Republican Gibraltar, and when his political robe fell from him it found lodgment on the shoulders of his son, who, as one of the youngest and brightest members, occupies his father's seat in the other end of this Capitol.

Leonidas C. Houk is gone, but his influence survives. His example as a self-made man will encourage many a poor and friendless boy to push towards the front; for his is a living chapter in the personal history of our country.

ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE OF THE PEOPLE.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the joint resolution sent up by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 84) proposing an amendment to the Constitution so as to permit the choosing of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people when any State shall so elect.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that this resolution be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

FINDINGS OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting copies of the findings of the court in the cases of the following-named persons against the United States: John Grice; James Wysong; B. GEORGE T. DUDLEY.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of George T. Dudley, no unfavorable report having been made thereon, and the bill having become a law.

KEYSTONE AND SPRING GARDEN NATIONAL BANKS, PENNSYLVANIA, AND MAVERICK NATIONAL BANK, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I report from the Committee on Rules the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask for its present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

JANUARY 11, 1892.

Mr. MUTCHLER submitted the following, which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Whereas the Keystone National Bank and the Spring Garden National Bank, located in the city of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, have become bankrupt, and are now in the hands of receivers; and

Whereas it is alleged that large sums of money belonging to the public, to the city of Philadelphia, and to the State of Pennsylvania have been lost by reason of bankruptcy; and

Whereas it is further alleged that the losses sustained, to a great extent, are due to willful negligence or inefficiency on the part of the officials of the United States Government, whose duty it was to examine and report the financial condition and standing of said banks: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed and required to investigate and report to the House the causes which led to the bankruptcy of said banks, or either of them, and to inquire and report whether any official or ex-official of the Government of the United States whose duty it was to examine and report the financial condition and standing of said banks neglected or refused to discharge or perform that duty; whether the losses sustained by the patrons of these banks or any part of such losses were occasioned by such neglect, and to inquire and report as to any fact or facts connected with the bankruptcy of said banks, the loss of any money by their depositors or patrons, and acts of any official of the United States necessary in said investigation as the committee may deem important, and also whether any, and, if any, what amendments to the national banking laws are necessary for the protection of the public against similar losses in the future.

That said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to employ experts to assist it in making the investigation. The expense attending the investigation to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution introduced by Mr. MUTCHLER of Pennsylvania, authorizing the Committee on Banking and Currency to investigate the failure of the Keystone National Bank and the Spring Garden National Bank, have considered the same, and report it back with a recommendation for its adoption.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, the resolution sets forth the object to be attained and also by way of preamble the charges that have been made in connection with them. I do not desire to discuss the matter, and, unless some gentleman does, I will ask for the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield for that purpose?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. I move to amend by inserting, after the words "Spring Garden National Bank," the words "and the Maverick National Bank of Boston."

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was put, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I demand the previous question upon the resolution.

Mr. ENLOE. I beg the gentleman to withdraw that demand and let us have the resolution reported again.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

Mr. BURROWS. Let it be reported as amended.

The resolution was again reported as amended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee demands the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. ENLOE. Before that demand is insisted upon I should like to make an inquiry.

Mr. McMILLIN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, if he desires to discuss the matter, for five minutes.

Mr. ENLOE. I would like to ask my colleague if in his judgment the resolution is broad enough in its scope to bring out in full copies of the latest affidavits on file in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, which were sworn to by the officers and attested by the directors, as to the actual condition of said banks at the close of business on the days appointed for all national banks by the Comptroller prior to the failure and suspension or after discovery of defalcation in any of the banks mentioned in the resolution? We want to know in each instance how soon after the date or filing of the affidavits in any case the suspension and discovery occurred.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will state, in response to my colleague, that the resolution is broad enough for that purpose. It was certainly the intention to give authority to investigate every material fact connected with the failure of the bank and the connection of the officers of the Government therewith. The resolution authorizes the committee, as my colleague will observe, to send for persons and papers and to take whatever steps are necessary for the development of the facts, and that authorization would, of course, embrace the right to investigate as to the day and hour to which my colleague's inquiry relates.

Mr. ENLOE. One other question. Will this resolution authorize the committee to ascertain whether any officer or director certifying under oath and attesting the correctness of the statements of the bona fide condition of any of these banks, as required by the Revised Statutes, is now or was then an officer or director of or in any other manner or capacity connected with any of those banks or any other national bank; and whether the affidavits at the time they were made were published in the newspapers as the law directs; and whether the true condition of any or of all of the banks named in the resolution was ascertained and reported by a national-bank examiner, or did the true condition of the banks in any case first become known through the public press? We want information on these points.

Mr. McMILLIN. I think the resolution is broad enough to elicit every fact material to the investigation; but if my colleague is of opinion that it is not, perhaps he can suggest such amendments as will make it broad enough to cover the entire case. What we want is a full investigation. I yield now five minutes, or whatever time he desires, to the author of the resolution, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MUTCHLER].

Mr. MUTCHLER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that in my judgment the resolution is broad enough to cover anything which the committee may desire to inquire into with respect to the conduct of national banks generally. The scope of the resolution is so wide as to authorize inquiry into any fact which the committee itself may deem necessary to be inquired into in order to ascertain what were the causes which led to the failure of these different banks. And it goes further; it authorizes the committee to consider and report to this House any amendment to the national banking law which it may think necessary in order to protect the public in the future against losses through these institutions.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MUTCHLER] yield to his colleague?

Mr. MUTCHLER. Certainly.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. I only desire to state, Mr. Speaker—and probably my colleague would have stated it—that there have been three special examinations into these bank matters in Philadelphia in relation to the Keystone National Bank and the Spring Garden National Bank. One of those investigations was made by a committee appointed by his excellency the governor of the State of Pennsylvania, another by a committee appointed by the citizens of Philadelphia, and the third by a committee appointed by the councils of the city of Philadelphia, each committee making a thorough examination. I simply wish that fact to go on record in connection with this resolution.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I am aware of all that, Mr. Speaker, and I am not here to find any fault with the manner in which those investigations have been conducted, but these institutions are the creatures of the National Government, they carry the name of the National Government, they receive credit because of the fact that they are national banks and the fact that the Government is presumed to exercise some advisory control or power over them.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. I do not want it to be understood for a moment that I oppose the adoption of this resolution. On the contrary, I favor it.

Mr. MUTCHLER. I think that we owe it to the people of this country, the people who put faith in the national banks and who deal with them because of their connection with the Government, to exercise whatever power we possess to protect the public against future losses in connection with such institutions. During the last year the defalcations and embezzlements in the State of Pennsylvania alone are reported to amount to upward of $7,000,000.

Mr. COOMBS. In connection with national banks?

Mr. MUTCHLER. No, not all in connection with national banks; but largely through those institutions. Now, I repeat, the public have a right to expect that the Congress will make a thorough investigation into the manner in which these national banks are conducted, and, if the power which the Government now exercises over them is found to be insufficient for the protection of the people, then they have a right to expect that we shall amend the national-banking laws so as to make these institutions more secure in the future; and that is the purpose of my resolution.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. McMILLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask attention to House bill No. 1949, for the relief of the late A. S. Core, a bill introduced by myself. It was introduced in the Fiftieth and Fifty-first Congresses and was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and was twice favorably reported to the House by that committee. In this House, however, it has been referred to the Committee on Claims, and I now ask unanimous consent that that committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has made some investigation and finds that the bill should go to the Committee on War Claims. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER, as the next business in order, proceeded to call the committees for reports of a public nature when the following reports were presented, and referred as respectively stated:

EASTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF TEXAS.

By Mr. CULBERSON, favorably, from the Committee on the Judiciary: A bill (H. R. 5176) to change the time of holding the courts in the eastern district of Texas—to the House Calendar.

ADDITIONAL JUSTICES, SUPREME COURT OF UTAH.

By Mr. RAY, adversely, from the Committee on the Judiciary: A bill (H. R. 3939) providing for two additional associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes—to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

SAFETY OF NATIONAL BANKS.

By Mr. BACON, from the Committee on Banking and Currency: A bill (H. R. 5681), as a substitute for H. R. 4281, for the better control of and to promote the safety of national banks—to the House Calendar.

BRIDGE AT BURLINGTON, IOWA.

By Mr. MILLS, favorably, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce: A bill (H. R. 4631) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge at Burlington, Iowa, approved August 6, 1888," as amended by act approved February 21, 1891—to the House Calendar.

PORT OF OGDENSBURG, N. Y.

By Mr. WISE, favorably, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce: A bill (H. R. 610) extending the privileges of the first and seventh sections of the act approved June 10, 1880, governing the transportation of merchandise without appraisement to the port of Ogdensburg, in the State of New York—to the House Calendar.

DETAIL OF ARMY OFFICERS TO THE WORLD'S FAIR.

By Mr. OUTHWAITE, with amendment, from the Committee on Military Affairs: A bill (H. R. 618) authorizing the Secretary of War to detail certain officers of the Army for special duty in connection with the World's Columbian Exposition—to the House Calendar.

INHABITANTS OF CHELAN, WASH.

By Mr. STOUT, favorably, from the Committee on Public Lands: A bill (H. R. 2568) for the relief of the inhabitants of the town of Chelan, in Okanogan County, State of Washington—to the House Calendar.

COURTS IN WISCONSIN.

The SPEAKER (having concluded the call of committees). The morning hour now begins at half past 12 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CULBERTSON. On behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary I call up the bill (H. R. 497) to determine the sessions of the circuit and district courts for the eastern district of Wisconsin. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. STOCKDALE].

Mr. STOCKDALE. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the regular terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Wisconsin shall be held at the times and places following: At Milwaukee, on the first Mondays of January and October, and at Oshkosh on the second Tuesday of June in each year.

SEC. 2. That sections 572 and 658 of the Revised Statutes, so far as they provide for different times for holding said courts, are hereby amended to conform to this act.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Mr. Speaker, it will not be necessary to read the report in this case unless some gentleman asks for the reading. The only change that this bill makes is in providing for holding the term of court at Oshkosh in June instead of July. Court is now held there once a year in the month of July; and this bill provides for an annual court at that place in June, the reason being that it is hot in July while it is pleasant in June. I sympathize with those people up there in that hot climate. [Laughter.]

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. STOCKDALE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION.

Mr. CULBERSON. On behalf of the Judiciary Committee, I call up the bill (H. R. 3927) to amend "An act to provide for the performance of the duties of the office of President in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice-President," approved January 19, 1886. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the first section of the act of which this is amendatory there shall be inserted after the words "Secretary of the Interior" the words, "or if there be none, or in case of his removal, death, resignation, or inability, then the Secretary of Agriculture."

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, in 1886 an act of Congress was passed providing that in case of the death or inability of both the President and Vice-President, the succession to the Presidential office should devolve upon the different members of the Cabinet in the order of their commissions. At that time the last official in the line of succession was the Secretary of the Interior. Since that time, the Department of Agriculture has been created, the Secretary of that Department being made a Cabinet official. In order, therefore, to preserve the harmony of our legislation and to avoid a seeming discrimination against the Department of Agriculture, this bill provides in reference to the succession to the Presidential office that the Secretary of Agriculture shall stand after the Secretary of the Interior. I ask a vote upon the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. POWERS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, in writing, was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

The message also announced the approval of the following bills:

A bill (H. R. 517) providing for the completion of the allotment of lands to the Cheyenne and Arapaho Indians;

A bill (H. R. 28) to amend an act entitled "An act granting right of way to the Hutchison and Southern Railroad Company through the Indian Territory;"

A bill (H. R. 2785) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend the general incorporation law of the District of Columbia," approved May 17, 1882; and

A bill (H. R. 3931) to detach Montgomery County from the western and add it to the eastern district of Arkansas.

AMENDMENT OF INTERNAL-REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, I now call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 566) to amend the internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes; and yield the floor to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM].

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever in any statute denouncing any violation of the internal-revenue laws as a felony, crime, or misdemeanor there is prescribed in such statute a minimum punishment, less than which minimum no fine, penalty, imprisonment, or punishment is authorized to be imposed, every such minimum punishment is hereby abolished; and the court or judge in every such case shall have discretion to impose any fine, penalty, imprisonment, or punishment not exceeding the limit authorized by such statute, whether such fine, penalty, imprisonment, or punishment be less or greater than the said minimum so prescribed.

SEC. 2. That no warrant in any case under the internal-revenue laws shall be issued upon an affidavit making charges upon information and belief, unless such affidavit is made by a collector or deputy collector of internal revenue or by a revenue agent: and with the exception aforesaid no warrant shall be issued except upon a sworn complaint, setting forth the facts constituting the offense and alleging them to be within the personal knowledge of the affiant. And the United States shall not be liable to pay any fees to marshals, clerks, commissioners, or other officers for any warrant issued or arrest made in prosecutions under the internal-revenue laws, unless there be a conviction or the prosecution has been approved in writing, either before or after such arrest, by the attorney of the United States for the district where the offense is alleged to have been committed, or unless the prosecution was commenced by information or indictment: Provided, That in each case where such prosecution has been approved by the district attorney as herein required, he shall make out a written statement of the grounds upon which he rests such approval, and shall send a copy of the same to the Attorney-General.

SEC. 3. That whenever a warrant shall be issued by a commissioner or other judicial officer having jurisdiction for the arrest of any person charged with a criminal offense such warrant, accompanied by the affidavit on which the same was issued, shall be returnable before some United States judicial officer named in section 1014 of the Revised Statutes residing in the county of arrest, or in the county in which the offense is alleged to have been committed, or, if there be no such judicial officer in either of said counties, before some such judicial officer residing in another county nearest to the place of arrest. And the judicial officer, before whom the warrant is made returnable as herein provided, shall have exclusive authority to make the preliminary examination of every person arrested as aforesaid and to discharge him, admit him to bail, or commit him to prison, as the case may require: Provided, That this section shall not apply to the Indian Territory.

SEC. 4. That the circuit courts of the United States, and the district courts or judges thereof exercising circuit-court powers, and the district courts of the Territories are authorized, with the approval of the Attorney-General, to appoint in different parts of the several districts in which said courts are held as many discreet persons to be commissioners of the circuit courts as may be deemed necessary. And the Attorney-General shall have authority to remove at pleasure any commissioners heretofore or hereafter appointed in said districts.

SEC. 5. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may compromise or discontinue any civil or criminal case arising under the internal-revenue laws upon such terms as shall be deemed reasonable.

SEC. 6. That this act shall take effect sixty days after its approval.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, this bill substantially has the approval of the Department of Justice, and was favorably reported by the committee during the last Congress.

The first section of the bill simply removes the limitations of minimum punishments in cases of the violation of the internal-revenue laws. It is found that in some sections of the country there have been great abuses upon the part of certain court officers, as well as upon the part of certain citizens themselves, in stirring up prosecutions under the internal-revenue laws for the purpose of creating and securing fees. The Government has been put to great expense in many States, notably in the State of Alabama, and probably in North Carolina and Georgia.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does this fix and limit the powers of marshals with processes of arrest?

Mr. BYNUM. That is contained in another section of the bill. I am speaking now of the first section. I will state to the gentleman that there are limitations as to the powers of marshals provided in another portion of the bill.

I have stated that it has been found that a great many prosecutions are inaugurated in some sections of the country, many of which have no foundation and others are mere cases of technical violation of the law. The minimum punishment fixed by the present law being a considerable fine, not less than $100, and thirty days' imprisonment, it has been found that the courts have been suspending sentence rather than inflict punishment in many cases.

I will state that this modification of the law meets the approval of the Department of Justice as well as of courts throughout the country. All of them agree that this limitation should be removed, and the matter of punishment left to the discretion of the court where there is a mere technical violation of the law. There are many cases where the court might properly impose a less punishment than the minimum now fixed by the statute. Under the present law these parties are required to remain in prison for the thirty days—the minimum time fixed by law—and at the same time to pay the fine and costs or to remain in prison thirty days longer before being discharged.

The second section has reference to the steps necessary to be taken to begin prosecutions in some cases before commissioners and provides how and under what circumstances warrants shall issue.

Mr. McMILLIN. Before the gentleman from Indiana leaves the first section let me ask if that is not substantially the provision that was contained in the Mills bill reported by the Committee on Ways and Means on the same subject?

Mr. BYNUM. I will state to the House that this is the same provision that was contained in the Mills bill, and also in a previous appropriation bill, except that there is a greater restriction in this section, in this, that even where a prosecution has commenced under this section it still remains with the district attorney to approve the prosecution before the fees can be paid to the commissioner, marshal, and clerk, unless there has been a conviction.

Mr. McMILLIN. I examined this whole subject with a good deal of care, having been chairman of the subcommittee that had charge of it, and I agree fully that the views expressed by the gentleman from Indiana are correct.

Mr. BYNUM. There is no question that this will be a great protection to the Treasury of the United States, as well as a protection to the people themselves against unjust prosecutions.

Another change is made, which gives to the Department of Justice the power of removal of the commissioners, a power that does not now exist in the Department of Justice, and it is somewhat doubtful whether it exists even in the circuit judges themselves.

Mr. OATES. If the gentleman from Indiana will allow an interruption——

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly.

Mr. OATES. The gentleman might add in that connection that there is no class of United States officials where, here and there, will be found a case that is more worthy of removal.

Mr. BYNUM. I have no doubt of it; though I have no complaints of this character from my own district, I hear of many in various other parts of the country, where commissioners are in collusion with professional witnesses, and to some extent with the parties who desire to get up prosecutions in order to obtain fees. There is no adequate remedy existing at present, and this bill is intended to provide against that class of cases.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask if the Internal Revenue Bureau have been consulted in regard to this?

Mr. BYNUM. They have been heretofore. They have not been consulted with regard to the preparation of the present bill. The Department of Justice, however, has been in previous Congresses, and has given its assent to the different provisions, many of which have been incorporated at the suggestion of the Attorney-General.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Do you know the views of the Treasury Department upon the matter?

Mr. BYNUM. They are all in favor of the measure, so far as the Revenue Department is concerned.

Mr. OATES. If the gentleman from Indiana will allow me just there, I wish to state that I was on a subcommittee that investigated the crookedness of these officials in different parts of the country last year, and in one notable case where the Attorney-General on information found requested the removal of the commissioner, the United States circuit judge, in whom the power was supposed to exist, refused to concur in the recommendations of the Department to remove the man, although the evidence was clear and convincing as to the manufacturing of illegal fees on the part of that official.

Mr. BYNUM. I will say in reply to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], in regard to the provision affecting the Internal Revenue Department, that the department, as I understand it, are favorable to the measure.

The amendments are of no great consequence. The bill as reported in the last Congress contained a provision empowering the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to compromise all cases with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. That section seemed to be so broad that it might authorize the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to compromise all suits, whether they arose under the internal-revenue laws or not. One of the amendments simply restricts the power of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to compromise suits in cases arising under the internal-revenue laws.

So far as the hearings before the commissioners are concerned, this law requires the preliminary case to be brought before the commissioner nearest the point where the crime is committed. This provision is to save traveling expenses of witnesses, and so forth. That section of the statute confers the same powers upon justices of the peace of the State as upon United States commissioners, and the committee thought best not to limit preliminary hearings to commissioners alone, but to leave the law as it now stands.

Mr. REED. Is that by section 3?

Mr. BYNUM. That is by section 3, I believe. That section, by striking out the words "United States," simply leaves the same powers existing under the section that now exist. It does not limit prosecutions before commissioners of the United States.

Mr. REED. Under section 3 every warrant has to be returnable before some judicial officer?

Mr. BYNUM. Some judicial officer.

Mr. REED. But not a United States judicial officer?

Mr. BYNUM. Not necessarily a United States judicial officer. It leaves the law standing just at it is now, and the provision incorporated in this third section would be a restriction upon the law as it now exists; and the committee were of the opinion that the law should remain just as it is now, without any change in that particular.

So I say that this bill is the same which was favorably reported in the last Congress without these two changes.

Mr. BROSIUS. Will the gentleman yield to me for an inquiry?

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly.

Mr. BROSIUS. In what respect does section 4 of this act alter the existing law?

Mr. BYNUM. That is, in regard to commissioners?

Mr. BROSIUS. The appointment of commissioners, and the unlimited power of the Attorney-General to remove?

Mr. BYNUM. That is a power that does not exist; nor is he, I believe, consulted as to the appointment of commissioners.

Mr. BROSIUS. Do you think it is desirable to clothe the Attorney-General with that power?

Mr. BYNUM. That is the opinion of the committee, and it is also the opinion of the Department of Justice.

Mr. BROSIUS. May I ask you another question?

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly.

Mr. BROSIUS. You may have stated it before, but I did not hear it. Does the Commissioner of Internal Revenue approve of this bill?

Mr. BYNUM. The provisions of this bill have not been submitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue this session; but I am credibly informed that heretofore the provisions of the bill have met with the approval of the State and Internal Revenue Departments.

I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] for ten minutes.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. I shall probably occupy less than ten minutes. This bill arises because of certain abuses which have been practiced in connection with prosecutions under the internal-revenue laws for the past few years. It is stated here that the provisions of the bill have the sanction of the Department of Justice. In a general way I think that is true; but there are some provisions in the bill which I do not know to be specifically approved by the Attorney-General. The first section embodies a principle that we have engrafted into a number of laws that have been passed by recent Congresses, doing away with the minimum punishments. As the revenue laws now stand, where a man is charged with an offense he may be only technically guilty, yet the judge is compelled under the law, if he sentences him at all, to give him a sentence of perhaps five years imprisonment. In such cases the judge is obliged either to suspend sentence or to inflict a penalty that is far out of proportion to the technical offense which has been committed.

As to the second section, I think it carries provisions which should receive the most careful scrutiny at the hands of this House. While practices that are entirely improper have prevailed in the past, in connection with the arrest of prisoners charged with offenses against the internal-revenue laws, and while a remedy should be devised, in my judgment, the remedy here given goes entirely too far and affords too much immunity to the offender; and I repeat that I do not understand that this section as it stands worded to-day has the approval of the Department of Justice. The section as it stands provides that no warrant, in any case under the internal-revenue laws, shall be issued upon an affidavit making charges on information and belief, unless such affidavit be made by a revenue agent.

Now, I might know of an offense against the internal-revenue law——

Mr. BYNUM. It is not limited to a revenue agent, but if made by a party not a revenue officer it must be made on actual knowledge.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. Well, I will read the exact words. I thought I had stated the matter accurately:

That no warrant in any case under the internal-revenue laws shall be issued upon an affidavit making charges upon information and belief, unless such affidavit is made by a collector or deputy collector of internal revenue.

Mr. BYNUM. Well, continue reading.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey (reading):

Or by a revenue agent.

Mr. BYNUM. Well, continue to read, and you will see.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. Precisely. I am continuing to read; but I can not read it all first.

Mr. BYNUM. You have not read the whole sentence yet.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey (reading):

That no warrant in any case under the internal-revenue laws shall be issued upon an affidavit making charges upon information and belief, unless such affidavit is made by a collector or deputy collector of internal revenue, or by a revenue agent.

I may have information and belief that is as strong to my mind as actual knowledge; yet, not being a revenue agent, I can not make any complaint, and while I am hunting up a revenue agent the offender escapes. That contingency ought not to be possible.

And—

I continue to read—

with the exception aforesaid, no warrant shall be issued except upon a sworn complaint, setting forth the facts constituting the offense and alleging them to be within the personal knowledge of the affiant.

I repeat what I was saying, that to get a warrant for an infraction of the revenue laws that warrant must be upon the affidavit of a revenue agent, with the exception that it may be issued upon the affidavit of an outsider when such outsider has actual knowledge.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Is that difference to the measure of the knowledge of the informant that prevails in the ordinary criminal cases in the United States courts? In other words, can an information be filed upon information and belief in ordinary cases in the United States courts in charges of murder, treason, and so on?

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. They can in my section. In our State practice anyone having information and belief that a crime has been committed may make an affidavit, and on that a warrant issues, the offender is arrested, and the fact is determined.

I do not see why the United States should extend a greater degree of immunity from arrest to the moonshiners of this country than to anybody else; and this bill as it stands does just that thing. So far as the purpose of the bill is concerned, to prevent illegal prosecutions, the purpose is good, but the language is bad. I want to say here, in justice to the Department of Justice, that by the exertions of that Department, seconded by an investigation made by the Committee on the Judiciary of the last Congress, these practices have been very largely broken up, and the difficulty does not exist to anything like the degree to-day that it has in former years.

As to the other portions of the bill, it will be noticed that section 4 authorizes the appointment of as many commissioners of the United States courts, by those courts, as they may deem necessary, if it be a dozen to the county. There is no limitation. There ought to be a limitation. There ought to be sufficient commissioners to enable each offender charged with a crime to be brought before a commissioner near his home; but we can not afford, in view of the accounts of these commissioners, which are coming in from day to day before the Department of Justice to be investigated, passed upon, and paid, to plaster this whole country with commissioners; and under the provision of this section as it stands, that thing is possible.

I have said all I cared to say in reference to this bill. There are many good things in it and its purpose is good; but, as I have said, and especially so far as section 2 is concerned, the language is very unfortunate in my judgment.

Mr. BYNUM. Mr. Speaker, how much time is there remaining of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. Of the morning hour there are thirty minutes remaining. More than that is remaining of the gentleman's time.

Mr. BYNUM. For the consideration of this bill how much time is remaining?

The SPEAKER. Twenty minutes has been consumed in the consideration of this bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Speaker, how much time is there remaining of the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. Thirty minutes are remaining of the morning hour.

Mr. BUSHNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question.

Mr. BYNUM. Certainly, I will answer a question of the gentleman.

Mr. BUSHNELL. The bill, if I understand it correctly, provides that complaint against an offender shall be returnable before a commissioner nearest to where the arrest is made.

Mr. BYNUM. That is the object of the bill.

Mr. BUSHNELL. And under another provision the Attorney-General is given power to remove all the court commissioners that he desires to remove?

Mr. BYNUM. Yes, to remove them.

Mr. BUSHNELL. He superintends the appointment of the commissioners, or, rather, their term of office.

Mr. BYNUM. He is given that power.

Mr. BUSHNELL. It strikes me that that is not a good provision, it will not work well in many portions of the country, I am certain.

Mr. BYNUM. But he has nothing to do with the appointments.

Mr. BUSHNELL. I find that he has nothing to do with the appointments. Several of these provisions, it seems to me, are not what they ought to be, and I would like this bill to go over for examination.

Mr. BYNUM. It can not go over in the morning hour. It goes on the Calendar as unfinished business. I understand the gentleman from North Carolina wishes to have a few minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I would like to have a few minutes. I think I can get through with what I desire to say in five minutes.

Mr. BYNUM. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina for five minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been before the Congress of the United States for four terms. It was practically adopted in the Forty-ninth Congress. That is to say, on the 3d of March, 1887, a vote was taken upon all the paragraphs of this bill, but a two-thirds vote was required to pass it, and it fell short of that, there being 139 votes in the affirmative and 112 in the negative. The bill has been unanimously reported by every Judiciary Committee that has ever considered it. The Judiciary Committee of the Forty-ninth Congress favorably reported it, and it was considered in the House with the result which I have stated. Then, in the Fiftieth Congress it passed the House unanimously without objection. It was reported unanimously by the Judiciary Committee of the Fifty-first Congress, but there was no vote taken upon it in the House, and it has been again reported favorably by the Judiciary Committee of the present House.

This bill was submitted by me to the present Attorney-General of the United States during the last Congress, and if I had known that it was to be considered this morning I would have looked up his letter. The letter, however, is alluded to in the report. My recollection is that the bill was amended in every part so as to conform to the wishes of the Attorney-General. There would seem to be only two or three objections to the bill. One objection is that it prohibits unofficial persons from swearing out affidavits upon information and belief. The second section authorizes a collector, deputy collector, or revenue agent to have a warrant issued upon an affidavit upon information and belief, and it is no hardship to the Government that private citizens should be prevented from doing that. The Government has these officials everywhere. If any offense or crime is committed there is no difficulty in obtaining one of these official persons to make an affidavit upon information and belief, and unless that is done there is seldom a conviction. On the other hand, if there is no official person to make the affidavit upon information and belief, all that the bill requires is that some citizen who knows of the fact shall make the affidavit upon his own knowledge.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I should like a little more time.

Mr. BYNUM. I will yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURROWS. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the provision of which he has just spoken finds its counterpart in any statute relating to other criminal offenses against the Government of the United States—counterfeiting, for instance?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. No, sir; this is something new.

Mr. BURROWS. Entirely new, is it not?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. It is new, but it is something that is approved by every man, in office and out of office, who has ever carefully studied the internal-revenue laws.

Mr. BURROWS. I do not ask the question for the purpose of intimating that I am against the bill, but I would like to have some explanation of why it is thought necessary to make this exceptional provision.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Well, the reason of is it that under the present law there are hundreds of frivolous prosecutions for violations of the internal-revenue laws. There are professional affidavit-makers all over an internal-revenue district. That state of things does not exist with reference to any other offenses or crimes against the Government, and the object of this provision is simply to discourage frivolous prosecutions.

Mr. BROSIUS. Won't it be just as likely to obstruct and prevent honest prosecutions?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. It can not prevent honest prosecutions.

Mr. BROSIUS. Will not a man who has the fear of paying the costs himself be deterred from making a complaint that ought to be made?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. No, sir; all he has to do is to report the case to the district attorney, or to the revenue agent, or the deputy collector of internal revenue, or to the collector, and each one of those officers, except the district attorney, is authorized to make an affidavit upon information and belief.

Mr. BROSIUS. Suppose they decline to approve it, then the complaint is not made.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Well, I say that if they decline to approve it, there ought to be no prosecution until the grand jury meets and finds an indictment.

Mr. BYNUM. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, there is one provision of this bill that I wish to bring to the attention of the House, because it will cure a very great evil which exists in my part of the country. When we understand the evil we shall find it easier to get at the remedy, and therefore I will say a word in explanation of this particular abuse. Under the existing law in thinly populated regions there are people who make complaints and swear out warrants for the sake of the costs which the cases carry.

More than two-thirds of such cases result in nothing except that men are arrested, carried a considerable distance from their homes, charged with these costs, and discharged. Outrages of a very grave character have often occurred in this way, where a man is carried out of his neighborhood, amongst strangers, and kept in prison until it suits the pleasure of the officials to try him. The citizen making such a complaint incurs no liability under the present law, while the injury inflicted upon the accused is often very serious. In the absence of any restraining power in the law, unprincipled men, through ill will and malice, frequently make these complaints, and the accused is subjected to great hardship, inconvenience, and loss; yet generally such a case amounts to nothing so far as the Government is concerned, and the man who is actuated by this ill will and malice is rewarded in the amount of the costs.

Now, this bill will put a stop to that evil. And, as suggested by a gentleman awhile ago, if there is any foundation for making a complaint, there is nothing in this to prevent its being made, because the citizen who knows the facts can report them to the district attorney, or to any of the Government officers, and if, upon examination of his statement, they come to the conclusion that the case ought to be prosecuted, they can swear out a warrant. Or, if they think it proper, they may postpone the matter until the grand jury is impaneled and can examine the case. I could give instances within my own knowledge where these abuses which I have briefly described have amounted to absolute oppression. More than that, unscrupulous men sometimes get into the positions of deputy marshals and go all over the country making oppressive arrests. Of course it is proper that these officials should be active in the discharge of their duty, it is proper that the law should be enforced, but the evil of which I have spoken certainly ought to be corrected, and this bill proposes to correct it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUSHNELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word or two.

Mr. BYNUM. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BUSHNELL. Five minutes.

Mr. BYNUM. I can not give the gentleman five minutes, but I will give him two.

Mr. BUSHNELL. Very well, two minutes. I want to offer an amendment.

Mr. BYNUM. I do not yield for an amendment——

Mr. BUSHNELL. The gentleman will not object to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there are now pending several amendments recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUSHNELL. I simply wanted to add a provision excepting the State of Wisconsin from the operation of section 3.

My reason for the amendment I have proposed is this: From experience I have had as district attorney in Wisconsin I know that the bill, unless amended, will increase two or three times the present expenses of prosecuting persons charged with selling liquor to Indians on this reservation in Wisconsin. It will require the district attorney to travel from 300 to 400 miles to the northern end of the State every time there is a complaint made that anybody is taking liquor upon the reservation or selling it to the Indians.

Mr. OATES. Can not the duty to which the gentleman refers be performed by the assistant district attorney? That is the practice now.

Mr. BUSHNELL. There is but one assistant district attorney there; and if the necessity of this extra travel devolves upon him, the fees will be the same as if the work were done by the district attorney. The additional expense thus entailed is wholly unnecessary. Under the existing circumstances there is scarcely ever a report of a case of that kind for prosecution, unless clear evidence has been obtained against the party, who is then brought before the commissioner by a deputy marshal. The parties accused generally waive examination, are admitted to bail, and appear at the proper term of the court to make their defense. I repeat that in Wisconsin the proceeding now proposed will increase several times the present expense.

Mr. BYNUM. I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. BURROWS. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana whether this bill in its present form, in all its sections, has been submitted to the Department of Justice and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and received their approval.

Mr. BYNUM. The bill has not been submitted by the present committee, but it was submitted by the committee of the last House, and a favorable report was made.

Mr. BURROWS. Was it submitted in its present form?

Mr. BYNUM. Just as it now stands, with the exception of the amendments which have been made by the committee. It was favorably passed upon by the committee in the last House.

Mr. BURROWS. But it was not passed by the House.

Mr. OATES. For the information of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], I will state that though this measure as a whole has not been submitted to the Attorney-General, I know that the different propositions embraced in it were approved by that officer when submitted to him during the last Congress.

Mr. BYNUM. I was so informed.

Mr. BURROWS. I wish the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] and the House would consent to let this matter lie over by unanimous consent until to-morrow, when it can be taken up the first thing. I think that that would be the best course.

Mr. BYNUM. If the gentleman will ask and obtain unanimous consent to that effect, I have no objection.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask unanimous consent that this matter may lie over until the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. BURROWS. I ask unanimous consent that this matter may be postponed until to-morrow, to be taken up in the morning hour. I would like to make, meanwhile, some inquiry about it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I have no objection to the gentleman's suggestion, but would like him to add to his request a provision that the time consumed upon this bill during the present morning hour be not counted against the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there are thirteen minutes of the morning hour remaining.

Mr. BURROWS. Thirteen minutes will undoubtedly be sufficient to complete the matter to-morrow.

Mr. CULBERSON. I would like to have the thirteen minutes added to our hour.

The SPEAKER. Of course this bill, under the rule, can continue before the House until the expiration of the morning hour to-day, and will then be in order in the morning hour to-morrow.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that; but I would be glad to use the thirteen minutes remaining upon another bill.

The SPEAKER. But suppose that bill be not finished?

Mr. CULBERSON. That is what I am afraid of.

Mr. HATCH. I demand the regular order. There are other committees waiting to be called.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, which is the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] for the previous question upon the pending bill and amendments.

Mr. BYNUM. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BYNUM] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BYNUM. In answer to the statement of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] I will say that I was informed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON] and by other members who have had the question under consideration for some time that this bill in its general provisions met the approval of the Department of Justice. I know that the provision in regard to the removal of minimum punishments meets with no opposition from any source. The provision to which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN] makes serious objection in regard to the commencement of prosecutions was, substantially, incorporated into an appropriation bill in the Forty-ninth Congress.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. But it was not submitted to the Attorney-General.

Mr. BYNUM. It was not; but I understand it has since that time met his approval. I understand also that the bill conforms to what has actually been the practice of the Federal courts in the State of Ohio—that in order to prevent frivolous prosecutions, prosecutions gotten up simply for the purpose of putting the Government to expense for witness fees, an order was issued by the district attorney prohibiting any commissioner from bringing prosecutions unless the cases were approved by the district attorney. So that there is nothing in this bill that is really new in this House or in Congress, because these provisions have been before Congress to my certain knowledge ever since the Forty-ninth Congress. The provision in section 3 of the bill really makes no change in the law as it now stands except to require criminals to be taken before the nearest officer.

In regard to the removal of commissioners, that is a change. There is no power now by which the commissioners for any cause may be removed. It is doubtful whether the courts have the power of removal. Some of them refuse to exercise it, and I think it is rightfully conferred some Department, and can be conferred upon none so well as upon the Department of Justice. For that reason I think the bill should pass.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I understand no gentleman desires to occupy the remaining time. I ask the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I would like to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. That would not be in order pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. BURROWS. If the previous question is not ordered then an amendment would be in order?

The SPEAKER. It would.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 89, noes 38.

Mr. DINGLEY. No quorum.

Mr. BYNUM. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 173, nays 39, not voting 119; as follows:

Mr. FITCH with Mr. FLICK.

Mr. SHIVELY with Mr. STORER.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas with Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa.

During the roll call the following proceedings took place:

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH. I understand the morning hour has expired. We are now in the midst of a roll call, and I desire as a matter of precedent under the rule to have the Speaker decide the point of order I now raise.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HATCH. I make the point of order that the morning hour having expired, the continuation of the roll call goes over until the morning hour to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. So far as the Chair is informed and believes, it has always been held that when the roll call has been commenced it can not be interrupted either by a standing order of the House that at a given hour the House shall adjourn, or by the expiration of the morning hour, or by any other similar case. The gentleman is aware of the fact, that frequently it has happened when under the order of the House the hour of 5 o'clock on Friday has arrived and the House should take a recess until 7:30, a roll call was in progress, and when the hour of 5 o'clock arrived the roll call would not be completed but would be continued to completion although it may have extended fifteen or twenty minutes beyond the hour of 5 o'clock.

The Chair will hold, therefore, that where a roll call has begun before the expiration of the morning hour it must be completed although its completion extends beyond the hour.

Mr. HATCH. I simply desired to make the point of order that we might have a ruling upon the question at the beginning of the session.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. That motion can be entered. Let it be entered. The morning hour having expired, and the matter not being disposed of, it will come up in the morning hour to-morrow as unfinished business.

APPENDIX TO CONGRESSIONAL DIRECTORY.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Printing. I desire to ask the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] to this report, inasmuch as it is upon a resolution which he introduced at an earlier day of this session. I ask first that the resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing are hereby directed to inquire into and inform the House by what authority the compiler of the Congressional Directory embraced in the last edition thereof the appendix from pages 149 to 406, inclusive, the additional cost thereof, and whether the same should not be omitted from future editions of said Directory.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask that, as a part of my remarks, the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing have considered the House resolution introduced by Mr. OATES, directing the committee to inquire into and report to the House by what authority the compiler of the Congressional Directory embraced in the last edition thereof the appendix from pages 149 to 406, inclusive, the additional cost thereof, and whether the same should not be omitted from future editions of said Directory. The committee addressed a communication to W. H. Michael, the clerk of the Senate Committee on Printing, who, under the law, compiles the Directory, inclosing a copy of said resolution and asking a reply thereto. The reply of the compiler is herewith inserted:

"[Congressional Directory, W. H. Michael, editor and compiler.]

"UNITED STATES SENATE, Washington, D. C., January 26, 1892.

"MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 25th instant, inclosing House resolution directing your committee to inquire into and inform the House 'by what authority the compiler of the Congressional Directory embraced in the last edition thereof the appendix from pages 149 to 406, inclusive.'

"Section 77 of the Revised Statutes of 1878 reads:

"'A Congressional Directory shall be compiled at each session of Congress, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing.'

"All the work I have done as compiler of the Directory has been performed under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing.

"Very truly, yours,

"W. H. MICHAEL.
"Clerk of Printing Records.

"Hon. JAMES D. RICHARDSON, M. C.,
"Chairman of the Committee on Printing of the House of Representatives."

It will thus be seen that the compiler claims that he did this work by direction of the Joint Committee on Printing. This, of course, means the joint committee in the Fifty-first Congress. The writer of this report was a member of that committee, the minority member. He was not present when any authority was given the compiler to publish said appendix and never heard of it until he saw it in the Directory.

The additional cost for inserting said appendix was $676.15.

The second edition of the Directory of this Congress has been published, and it will be seen by reference thereto that said appendix is omitted therefrom.

The committee, having thus answered the inquiries proposed in said resolution, can not see that there is any necessity to pass same, and recommend that it lie on the table.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, just a word. The resolution of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES] came to the committee, and we took steps to investigate or make inquiries, as directed in the resolution. The letter from the compiler of the Directory, who is the clerk of the Senate Committee on Printing, shows, as he states, that he had the authority of the joint committee to insert this appendix, which consists simply of maps of the Congressional districts. The additional cost is shown to have been $676.15. It will be seen that the inquiries of the gentleman from Alabama are answered, and the committee could not see that it was necessary to adopt the resolution or to authorize the making of any further inquiry. I therefore suggest that the resolution lie on the table, and that the report be printed as a part of my remarks, showing the answer of the compiler. Therefore we think it is not necessary to take any further steps.

Mr. OATES. I only wish to say that I think there is a good deal of printing done which costs the Government large sums of money, and which might well be omitted, in which opinion I believe the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] fully concurs. I am satisfied with this report, and do not care to prosecute the inquiry any further.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Do I understand my colleague to say that he never had any notice of any action being taken by his committee for having this additional matter put into the Congressional Directory?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I had no knowledge of the meeting of the joint committee in the last session. Of course I know action was taken authorizing the printing of this appendix. It is proper for me to say that the gentlemen comprising the majority of the committee last session were my colleagues, Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut and Mr. Stivers of New York, neither of whom I believe is present at this time. Therefore I have not been able to ascertain as to whether authority was given in the committee to have this printing done; but inasmuch as the clerk of the committee and the compiler of the Directory stated that he had such authority, I presume he had.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I was very glad to hear the resolution when it was introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OATES]. I thought then that important collection of biographies was being unnecessarily encumbered by a lot of stuff that I did not think was necessary for constant publication; and therefore I think it is well enough for the House to start out by not encouraging such a line of publication.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will say that it is omitted from the second edition; and I do not know that it will ever be published again. Therefore I ask that the resolution be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the resolution be laid on the table. Without objection that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Ways and Means to report the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, providing for the distribution of the President's message. Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, so far as the subjects usually embraced in the President's message are concerned, the recommendations in this resolution are those which are usually made, and as to other matters, the recommendations are believed to be the proper ones. I move that the committee rise and report the resolution to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCCREARY, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a resolution in regard to the distribution of the President's annual message, and had directed him to report it back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, unless some gentleman desires to have the resolution read again, I move that the reading be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. MCMILLIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MCCREARY in the chair.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4636) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1893.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. KILGORE and Mr. BRETZ objected.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill. After the reading had continued for some time, Mr. KILGORE withdrew his objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILGORE] withdraws his objection to dispensing with the first reading of the bill; is there further objection?

Mr. NEWBERRY. I object. I desire now to have the bill read through.

The Clerk resumed the reading, but before it was completed, Mr. NEWBERRY withdrew his objection, and unanimous consent was given to dispense with the further first reading.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, if no gentleman desires to speak to the bill, I am ready to proceed with the consideration of it by paragraphs.

Mr. DOCKERY. I wish to say that a number of gentlemen on this side do desire to discuss the bill.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. How much time do gentlemen desire?

Mr. DOCKERY. I am not prepared to speak for any one but myself. I should like fifteen or twenty minutes.

Mr. BLOUNT. Before the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] undertakes to fix the time for general debate, as this bill is larger than those of preceding years, I trust he will give the House some explanation of that fact.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to two hours; one hour on each side.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I think we can get along with less time than that.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think the gentleman from Alabama will find that the House does not care much about general debate upon this bill, and if he will explain the bill, we may then be able to consider it by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] asks unanimous consent that general debate upon this bill be limited to two hours. Is there objection?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that request and make an explanation of the bill, and then it may be found that it will not be necessary to occupy so much time as two hours in general debate.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I withdraw the request.

Mr. Chairman, the duty has been cast upon the Committee on Military Affairs to prepare a bill for the support of this Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1893. During the period that I have had the honor to be in Congress I have never known a committee to take the pains or to exercise the scrutiny that has been exercised in this case to reduce this bill to the lowest figure possible consistent with the well being of the institution which it is their duty to protect. The recommendations of the officers in charge of the Academy included a recommendation for expenditures there of between $600,000 and $700,000, and they were sustained in that recommendation by the report of the Boards of Visitors to the Academy for the last several years.

The officers of the War Department, in their anxiety to reduce expenses as far as possible, cut down the recommendations to the sum of $554,000, and sent those estimates to the House, recommending that Congress should appropriate that amount for the Academy for the year for which this bill is designed to support the institution. The Committee on Military Affairs, in their anxiety to still further reduce these expenses, has struck off $88,000 from the amount recommended and have presented a bill which appropriates $465,000, which is $115,000 less than the average appropriation for the last three years.

Since reporting the bill the Committee on Military Affairs have used every effort to ascertain if any items could by possibility be reduced or omitted. As a result of that investigation the committee have considered the advisability of striking out items still further reducing the bill to about $439,000, which is less than half the amount of the bill enacted by the last Democratic House of Representatives and $141,000 less than the average of the appropriations for the Academy for the last three years, or, to make the comparison more definite, this bill is but a trifle over two-thirds the average of the bills for the past three years.

Such action on the part of the committee would enable the House to appropriate sufficient to increase the lighting facilities, which the evidence before the committee showed to be a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

The method of examination is now changed, and the number of cadets will be larger during the year for which this bill appropriates than for any preceding year since the Academy was established.

Some criticism has been made, and will doubtless be made in the House, because this bill is larger than the bill of the last Congress and a little larger than the bill of the preceding Congress. The reason for that increase is that the preceding bill gave such adequate appropriations for repairs and buildings that the two later ones did not require to be so large.

The bill enacted three years ago by a Democratic House appropriated over $900,000, more than half of which was for improvements and betterments, and the expenditure of this large sum has extended over the period since that time.

It will be observed that there was no necessity for large bills during the last two sessions of Congress, and therefore it is hardly just to compare the present bill with that of last year.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman refers to the bill of 1890 as having been large.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. Now, will my friend compare this bill with the bills of preceding years?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Well, our bill is a little larger than some and smaller than others. It runs about $20,000 above the average.

Mr. BLOUNT. The bill of 1890 was an exceptionally large one, was it not, under exceptional conditions?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes. That bill contained a number of items that were deemed by Congress and the country to be essential to the maintenance of the Academy, and, those matters having been provided for, the necessity for such large items has not arisen since and does not arise in this bill. But the inspection of the post of West Point and of the Academy by officers of the Medical and the Engineer Department has developed the fact that radical changes are essential in order to fit the post and the Academy for the uses for which they were designed. Some three or four years ago epidemics of diphtheria and scarlet fever and malarious diseases of several kinds were developed at that place, where, for very many years before, there had been perfect health and perfect exemption from diseases of that character.

An inspection has shown that a false system of sewerage and plumbing has resulted in such evils, that the officers who made the inspection expressed surprise that there was not more sickness than was really developed at that place. These officers have recommended that a modern system of plumbing and sewerage should be adopted. Last year we appropriated $15,000——

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama, Yes, sir.

Mr. SAYERS. You say that $15,000 was appropriated for this purpose last year?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAYERS. Can you state to the committee how much of that $15,000 had been expended up to the 1st day of January of the present year?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I can not say how much was expended up to that time, but nearly all of that appropriation has been expended up to the present time, and the opinion of the board was that $33,000 would be necessary to complete this work; but we have cut down that estimate to the extent of $3,000. They asked $18,000 in addition to what has already been appropriated, and we have given but $15,000.

The board further reports that the soldiers' quarters are, to use the language of one gentleman, almost a pest-house—a place where the Government has no right to quarter men employed in its service, and they recommend $15,000 for improving subsoil and surface drainage and to place those quarters in a sanitary condition.

In addition to this: An inspection of the eyes of the cadets within the last two years has, as is shown in the report before me, developed the fact that with very few exceptions every one of the three hundred cadets of that Academy has had his eyes very materially injured; and of the last graduating class almost a third, more than one-fourth, had their eyes so materially and permanently injured that the academic board reported that they were not fit to be officers of the Army. Several plans were suggested to correct this evil. One was to leave the gas plant as it is and to add an electric plant. This would involve an estimated cost of $69,000, and the running of it an annual cost of $11,000 to $13,000.

Another estimate was that by an expenditure of $48,000 for improving the present gas plant an adequate and proper light could be given to the cadets. This was recommended as in the interest of economy, because a larger plant could be run with very little extra expense, thus virtually saving $11,000 to $13,000, or, according to some estimates, $15,000, which it would cost to run the electric plant.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman has just been referring to the fact that within a year or two many of the cadets have been almost threatened with blindness.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know when that complaint originated—whether it is not a new development there?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It is thirty-five years since the present gas plant—the present gas fixtures—were put in that Academy.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to know from the gentleman from Alabama whether this trouble about the eyes of the students is not a modern development, within the last two or three years?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will come to that point in a moment. The gas plant there within the last two or three years has been subjected to extra work in order to supply light to half as many more rooms, and the consequence has been that with the deterioration of the pipes and the deterioration of the plant and by reason of extending the gas to numerous new buildings, the evil has become manifestly much worse now than it was some ten or fifteen years ago.

Mr. BLOUNT. Have we not every year been making appropriations for the purpose of keeping those works in good condition?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I do not think there has been any appropriation within the last year or two for improving the gas plant. We have, as any business people would have done, made appropriations for repairs of the building, for sewerage, plumbing, and the necessary appendages to the Academy. No man with business capacity or common sense would undertake to maintain public buildings in good order and repair for constant use without an annual expenditure of 5 or 6 per cent of their value to overcome inevitable deterioration. And we have adopted that system in reference to West Point, except when some false economist has been willing to let the buildings go to ruin, and therefore has struck out such items.

The committee were confronted with reports from the Board of Visitors, the medical inspectors, engineer inspectors, and the superintendent of the Academy, which showed an imperative necessity for immediate improvement of the lighting facilities and perfecting the sanitary condition of the establishment.

These reports were transmitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of War.

To remedy these evils they recommended appropriations amounting to $144,000.

The committee struck out $40,000, leaving $104,000 for what was ascertained to be the most imperative improvements. The committee also cut down other items in the bill to a lower point than for many years, so that, with the $104,000 added for permanent improvements, the bill reaches $465,000, and this the committee contemplate reducing to $439,000, and they submit the other items to Congress for its judgment and action.

Mr. WATSON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, sir; I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to line 24, page 2, of this bill, and ask him to give us the information necessary, on the part of some of us at least, to understand it.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Does the gentleman refer to the item for pay of cadets, $166,000?

Mr. WATSON. Yes, sir; the item reads:

For pay of cadets, $166,000; and no cadet shall receive more than at the rate of $540 a year.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. That is statutory.

Mr. WATSON. Now, will the gentleman be kind enough to explain what in practice is charged up against cadets to be deducted from that allowance?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. There is charged against him, first, $4 per month as a fund to be retained until graduation; second, about $15 a month for his food; third, his clothes; fourth, his books; and all of his pay is consumed, and more than consumed, by these necessary expenditures which are involved.

A MEMBER. And the circular states that he must put up another $100?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. WATSON. You do not mean that $50 per month is retained for his food?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. No; about $15. It runs from $14 to $17.

Mr. WATSON. I misunderstood you. I thought you said $50.

Mr. DOCKERY. Right there, if the gentleman will allow me. I have not the figures at hand, but I wish to ask him a question in regard to this bill.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not know that I understood correctly, but if I did, the gentleman stated this, that the bill was about in the line, so far as the aggregate appropriation carried by the bill was involved, of preceding bills for this purpose?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The bill will average within about $20,000 of previous bills, I should think.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have in my hand printed tables showing the appropriations for the support of the Military Academy from the Forty-third to the Fifty-first Congress inclusive, and it reveals the fact that this is the second largest bill ever presented to the House of Representatives.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Well, I did not go back to the Forty-third Congress, because it is not to be compared with the present time. The number of cadets is larger now than were in the institution at that time, and it required much less expense to keep up the institution. But I say that the bill does not average exceeding $20,000 in excess of the bills which have been submitted since the institution has reached its present size.

Mr. BLOUNT. What is the difference as to the number of cadets now and in the Forty-third Congress?

Mr. DOCKERY. I am not prepared to state exactly.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. You all know that the institution has been gradually increasing. When you increase the number of Representatives on the floor of course you also increase the number of cadets; and hence it will take a larger sum to keep up the institution now than ever before.

During the year for which this appropriation is to be used the number of cadets will be greater than at present, and will exceed the number ever at the Academy.

Under the new method of examination the next fourth class will be very large.

Mr. DOCKERY. The only bill that exceeds in the amount of the appropriation the present bill, as I gather from a table prepared by the clerks of the Senate and House Committees on Appropriations, is the bill of the Fiftieth Congress, second session of that Congress, which carried $902,000; $600,000 of that amount being for the purpose of erecting new buildings. And hence the statement stands, according to this table, that this is the second largest bill ever presented to the House or to the country, and will be the largest appropriation ever made, but one, for the Military Academy if the House approves of it.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Well, there is a reason for it.

Mr. DOCKERY. I should be very glad to know the reason.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I am endeavoring to give the reason. The development has been made that these permanent improvements are absolutely essential for the preservation of the health of the cadets and the protection of their eyes.

Now, one item alone carried by this bill is $48,000 for increasing the gas plant, which is, as all know, a matter of economy, because if we do not provide a gas plant of suitable size we will be compelled to adopt the electric light, with its attendant expenses for maintenance.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman please state to the House, so that every member can hear it, a response to this inquiry? If I am correctly informed that item of $50,000 for gas plant is not carried in the estimates at all. The Department has not asked for it.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The Department has asked for it, and asked for it specially; and it is the only item in the whole bill that they did ask for specially.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is it in the estimates?

Mr. DOCKERY. Is the $50,000, on page 17—

For enlarging and increasing gas plant, and for placing a two-light pendant with side light in each cadet room, to be immediately available upon approval of this act $50,000—is that in the estimates submitted by the Department?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. In the estimates—when the appropriation of $3,320 was made for the gas fixtures. At that time it was undetermined by the Government whether it was best to have an electric plant or to increase the gas plant. After they had investigated it, and found the economy of increasing the gas plant, they sent this letter to the committee:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 23, 1892.

SIR: Referring to the call at the Department of Hon. Joseph Wheeler, of your committee, in regard to the propriety of inserting in the estimates for the United States Military Academy at West Point, for the next fiscal year, an item making an appropriation for the extension of the gas plant at that institution, I have the honor to advise you that this subject was fully treated of in the last annual report of the superintendent of the Academy, who recommended that an appropriation of $48,000 be made for the purpose of carrying out a proposed plan to provide better lighting facilities, which he remarked was a very important and almost absolutely necessary improvement.

I heartily concur in the views of the superintendent, and recommend that the appropriation asked for be granted.

Very respectfully,

S. B. ELKINS,
Secretary of War.

THE CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
House of Representatives.

Now, I will send to the desk, and ask the Clerk to read, the report of the superintendent.

Mr. DOCKERY. Before that is read, will the gentleman allow me another question? I wish to ask whether or not that letter is in reply to a request from himself or the committee?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It was in reply to an inquiry as to the best plan of meeting this difficulty, which was an insurmountable obstacle, and an imperative duty devolved upon the committee to provide for the exigency with which they found themselves confronted.

Mr. DOCKERY. It did not come from the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It comes from the Secretary of War, Mr. Elkins.

Mr. DOCKERY. The law requires that all estimates shall be transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury. Is not that correct?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I do not think it is at all material where the letter comes from. It might have originated with the committee, or it might have originated with any member of this House.

Mr. DOCKERY. It is very material, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me to say so, because that is the course prescribed by law.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Now, I ask the Clerk to read the extract from the report which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXTENSION OF GAS PLANT AND METHOD OF LIGHTING CADET BARRACKS.

During past years great complaint has been made of the character of light furnished cadets for studying at night, and in my last annual report I submitted a plan and estimate for a complete electric light and power plant for this post.

This plan did not meet with favorable consideration and no action was taken upon my recommendation.

During the past year the post surgeon has recommended the use of glasses for studying in a number of cases of cadets, and at the medical examination of the graduating class in June, the surgeons informed me that the eyes of nearly every graduate were more or less congested; nineteen of the young gentlemen failed to come up to the requirements of the War Department as to vision, and six failed to read the test type at three-fourths of the required distance. In every instance the young gentlemen claimed that the difficulty had commenced since they entered the Military Academy.

The gas furnished for the use of the post is reported by the professor of chemistry, who tests it frequently, as of excellent quality. Owing to some bad coal furnished by the contractor, it contained more or less sulphur on two or three occasions during the year.

The gas jet used in barracks is what is known as the bat-wing burner, placed upon an arm 10 inches long projecting directly from the side wall of the room and over the table. Two cadets, one on each side of the table, study by this light, which not only is of insufficient power, but gives out so much heat near the head of the student as to be exceedingly uncomfortable.

In order to furnish a better light I propose to increase the gas plant sufficiently to furnish a full supply for all buildings on the post and to place in every room in barracks a plain iron chandelier with two arms and a slide drop light. This chandelier will be in the center of the ceiling, immediately over the table, so that the cadets can study without difficulty.

An estimate of $48,000 is submitted for the purpose of carrying out this plan, and I earnestly urge that an appropriation be made for this very important and, I may say, almost absolutely necessary improvement.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will ask to have the Clerk read the report by the medical officer of the inspection of these barracks.

The Clerk read as follows:

The light now in general use in the cadet barracks is the gas flame or jet supplied by what is known as the "beacon-light," "bat-wing burner." This burner consists essentially in a short horizontal tube terminating at each end in a small vertical tube from which the gas is fed. Attached to the center of the horizontal piece is a longer vertical tube, which seems to have been designed to act in some way as a pressure regulator. A short nipple beneath the horizontal piece (appearing as a prolongation downward of the vertical tube) is screwed for attachment to the gas pipe, the whole arrangement having the appearance of an inverted cross, with the extremities of the horizontal arm bent up, and provided with the narrow openings or slits for the exit of the gas. It is seen, therefore, that it is a double jet. This constitutes the entire illumination for each room. There is no special feature about this burner, except the central vertical pipe, which, as above stated, is probably intended to regulate the pressure of the gas as it is supplied to the burners.

There is no arrangement for regulating the flow of gas except the key on the common supply pipe, by which the flame may be turned down or out. This (double) burner is provided with a white glass shade, having the shape of a truncated cone, the diameters of top and bottom being 5 inches and 10 inches. The shade is suspended over the two flames by means of a wire frame, into which the upper or small rim of the shade is fastened. The frame is attached to the top of the vertical pipe or stem already described as the special feature of the burner.

The general character and defects of the light produced by this burner may be briefly stated as follows: (1) Good illuminating power; the light is indeed, unless suitably modified by distance and proper shading, much too bright for the eyes; (2) unsteadiness (flickering); (3) variability of intensity; (4) high degree of heat; and (5), as a necessary result of the combustion of the gas, a large and rapid production of carbonic acid in the apartment.

Mr. DOCKERY. To what time does this report refer?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. This was the condition of affairs last year.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WHEELER. Yes, I will yield for a question.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman from Georgia asks if this defect of eyesight had not developed itself during the last few years. I would like to have the gentleman state, having once been in the Academy, if the scope of study and the strictness of the rule enforced there to-day is not much greater than it was a few years ago?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I am much obliged to the gentleman for asking the question, because it develops a point which I ought to have thought of and mentioned myself; and I will say that he is correct, that the length of study required to master the course now is much greater than it was, and the strain upon the eyes of the cadets is much greater; and while that is true, the light facilities are very much inferior.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. The gentleman from Alabama does not mean to say that the more they study there the less light the students have? [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. As the years have advanced they have increased the amount of study required, and it takes a longer time to be devoted to study; and although the study has become more intense, this gas plant, thirty-five years old, has been getting worse and worse, and been giving these cadets less and less light facilities.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will you look at page 20, lines 8 and 9, of the bill and explain to the House the item—

For balls, pins, and fixtures for bowling alley.

Will the gentleman explain how these enter into a military education or improve the eyesight of the boys?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It will not improve their eyesight; but $100 invested in that manner will give these poor cadets, who have to be at their studies or in their recitation rooms or in their beds twenty-two hours out of the twenty-four, and an hour and a half at their meals, a little opportunity during the severe winter periods, when they can not exercise out in the snow, to go to this bowling alley and have that necessary exercise which the facilities offer, and which everyone recognizes as essential for their health, and when the Government of the United States gets so poor that it can not appropriate $100 for the health of the cadets at this institution, a majority of them being the sons of farmers, we ought to hang our heads in shame and bow down to Chile as our superior. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DOCKERY. Was an item of similar import in the last appropriation bill?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I think it was not. I do not know that it was, because the bowling alley and gymnasium have just been completed. They had a very inferior bowling alley before.

Mr. DICKERSON. Do not all first-class colleges have gymnasiums?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. All first-class colleges and schools that our farmers' sons go to have gymnasiums.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Do you think the Government ought to put people to the expense of paying for that bowling alley who have not bread and meat enough to feed their wives and children?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. No, I do not think so, and if the gentleman will estimate it, I think he will find that it will not amount to more than the one-hundredth or one-thousandth part of a cent to any one person.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But the increase in this appropriation amounts to over $63,000 over the last appropriation, and that is a part of it.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. This hundred dollars is essential to carry out the purposes of a former Congress, which appropriated $35,000 for a gymnasium; and that gymnasium would be of no service at all unless it had the furniture necessary to equip it; and if there is anybody to be criticised it is the preceding Congress, that appropriated for the building of a gymnasium, and not this Congress, which simply proposes to appropriate $100 to give furniture for this purpose.

I am the last man in the world that would advocate an extravagant or improper expenditure, but I will inform my friend that before a month passes over us we will be confronted by bills involving millions and hundreds of millions of the people's money, many of the items involving expenditures which should be subjected to the closest scrutiny.

If we exclude Sundays and holidays our Government is expending nearly $2,000,000 every day. When these bills come up we will want my friend's strongest efforts in behalf of the people.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield for a question?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will gladly yield to my friend.

Mr. SIMPSON. I would like to know why you ask for an appropriation of $9,240 for the Military Academy band. Is it necessary to have so large an appropriation to pay for a band?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. That is very much smaller than the appropriation used to be in the economical times my friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] speaks of; it used to be sometimes double and triple that, but in a spirit of economy we have reduced it to $9,000.

Mr. SIMPSON. Are the members of the band cadets?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Oh, no; they are soldiers.

Mr. SIMPSON. Regularly enlisted soldiers?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Regularly enlisted soldiers.

Mr. SIMPSON. Do they get their pay as soldiers?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. They get their allowance as soldiers. And I want to say, in answer to my friend from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON], that these cadets at West Point are three-fourths of them the sons of these very farmers that he and I reverence and whose rights we defend [applause]; and when my farmer friends send cadets to West Point I am determined that those farmers' sons shall be taken care of. Some of the brightest cadets are sons of farmers. I answer my friend that if he will be as earnest in advocating the interests of farmers as I have been (and I feel certain that he will), I hope we can accomplish something for these excellent citizens.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. I have noticed very closely the report of the surgeon who made the examination of the light. He says that there is plenty of light, and he comments on it in certain ways; but I can not quite determine what the effect of that light is that they wanted to remedy.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I think the gentleman will find what the defect is.

Mr. BUTLER. He says sometimes the light is such as to be confusing to the eyes—too much light. Now, I want to know where the defect is that you want to remedy?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The defect is in not having a strong enough flow of gas, so that they may be able to control it and yet give a steady light.

Mr. PICKLER. He says it is sometimes strong and sometimes too weak.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. If the gentleman has ever been under an electric light in the streets, he must have observed that at times there would be a sudden flash of light and the next moment it would be dark; and he must see the necessity for a steady light. Sometimes this light may be so strong as to almost blind the eyes and the next moment the students are in comparative darkness, and yet they are expected in that kind of light to prepare their studies for the next day.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. On page 19 I find an item appropriating several thousand dollars for tearing up a board floor and putting in a tile floor. Now, I would like to know what necessity there is for that, and whether that will affect the eyes of the students, and whether they would not likely live a year or two more if they had a board floor? There are lots of people in my State, who pay the tax, living on sod floors.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will read the recommendation of the officers on that subject. [After a pause.] I can not put my hand on the paper this moment, but I will say that it has been recommended by the Board of Visitors and by the superintendent. They especially recommend the tile floor at this time because the plank floor has worn out, and they thought it more economical in replacing it to replace it with a tile floor, which would be more durable, lasting forever, and be easier cleaned than a plank floor. The actual cost of cleaning a plank floor would exceed the whole cost of the tile floor in a very few years.

The policy of a great Government like this is to erect all their buildings in the most durable and permanent manner. All of the buildings at West Point and at our new military posts are built of stone. I know that my intelligent friend would not advocate that these buildings should be built of wood, and for the same reason I know when he reflects upon it he would concur with the Government officials that it is cheaper to replace this worn-out floor with permanent material than with wood, which would wear out in a short time.

I am very sorry to hear that there are people in North Dakota who live on sod floors.

If these people will only come to the rich fields and balmy climate of Alabama they will never be subjected to the fearful hardships which befall the people of North Dakota.

Alabama offers hospitable and comfortable homes to them all.

Mr. LONG. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. LONG. On page 18, from line 9 to 14, there is an item which relates to work on a road there.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will explain that to the gentleman. Up to two years ago that property did not belong to the Government. Then what is known as the Kingsley estate was purchased, which extended from the Government property down to Highland Falls. Before they purchased it, the county of Orange kept up that road. Since it has become the property of the Government it is compelled to keep it up, and, as there is a great deal of traffic on the road, they must keep it in repair.

Mr. LONG. How is it?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It is about a mile in length.

Mr. LONG. Then the Government owns that land now?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, sir, the Government owns it. They bought it two years ago.

I do not think it necessary to say anything more about the gaslight. I do not think it necessary to discuss where this recommendation came from. If it had originated in the mind of any member of Congress on this floor it would be commendable in that Congressman to have conceived of an amendment to this bill by adding to it a provision to carry out an absolutely indispensable purpose.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee for a question.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman may have answered the question, but I was called out once and did not catch his response, if he did. Is this recommendation for a new gas plant made for the first time, or was it made before?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It was made to the last Congress and has been made to other Congresses.

Mr. DOCKERY. And declined.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. No, it was not declined. The reason why it was not adopted by the last Congress was because they were discussing whether it would be better to put in a gas plant or an electric plant. After a careful investigation of estimates obtained from all quarters as to its advantages and as to the economy and the well-being of the Academy, it was determined that this would be the most economical, and they ask to have the gas plant put in. It will save the Government some $12,000 to $15,000 a year. That is a good showing in the interest of economy, and they recommend the putting in of the gas plant rather than to put in an electric plant.

I do hope that this great Academy, which is conducted and has been conducted by those in charge of it in a manner to enlist the admiration of the military men of the world who come over to examine the details of that institution, will be granted this improvement. Never has that Academy, with all the able men in control of it, been conducted with more wisdom and more economy, and in a manner more conducive to carry out its purpose, than under its present able and distinguished superintendent, who made these recommendations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another item that is criticised, upon which I regret to have to speak.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. PICKLER. I would like to inquire whether the Committee on Military Affairs, after an investigation of this matter, have found that something is necessary looking toward the improvement of the light, in order to actually save the eyes of the cadets in that institution?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. They regard it as absolutely essential. Not satisfied with those reports, the committee sent for the medical officers in charge and brought them before it, and I will say, in repetition of what I said awhile ago, that even after the bill had been reported, out of deference to the opinions of gentlemen whom we all respect and who seem to think that some further reduction might be possible, the committee was reconvened and went over these items again, examining experts, corresponding with officials, and devoting days to the investigation; finally, however, they felt themselves unable, in the performance of the duty imposed upon them, to reduce these items further in any way whatever, and therefore they have come to the House with the bill in its present form.

Mr. BRETZ. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. With pleasure.

Mr. BRETZ. On page 3, beginning with line 5, there is an appropriation of $9,240 for the band, referred to by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON].

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRETZ. Now, on page 15, beginning with line 14, there is an appropriation of $250 for the purchase of musical instruments and music for this band; and what I want to know is, whether it is the purpose of the committee that the Government shall pay the members of this band $9,000 and purchase instruments for them in addition.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The Government owns the instruments, and there has been a small annual appropriation like this one for many years. I have never known an Academy appropriation bill that did not contain an item for some little increase of or repairs to musical instruments.

Mr. BRETZ. How many members are in that band?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I had a paper showing the exact number, but I do not find it at this moment. I think the Military Academy band numbers twenty-three.

Mr. BRETZ. Can the gentleman state what would be the cost of an entire new outfit of instruments for the band?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I never saw an estimate for that. The band has been built up gradually in this way by small appropriations from year to year, and I have never seen an estimate or a proposition to renew it entirely.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will always yield to my friend for a question.

Mr. BUTLER. I am very deeply interested in this question of the eyesight of the cadets. If it can be shown clearly that there is a defect of the gas fixtures, or in the gas itself, by which the cadets are liable to become injured in their sight, it is important for us to know it and to act accordingly. But I notice that in the report upon this subject much stress is made upon the fact that the gas jets come out at the side, and that, being immediately over the cadets, the gas overheats their heads and eyes. Now, can the gentleman tell us whether these gas jets are in any different position from that which they have occupied in the past?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. They have been in the same place for thirty-five years.

Mr. BUTLER. Then the position of the gas jets did not make the cadets blind twenty or thirty years ago?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Well, the light twenty years ago was even, the gas fixtures were comparatively new, the gas plant was sufficient.

Mr. BUTLER. But the point I am on now is that the position of the gas jets is not what is injurious to the sight of the cadets.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state that there has been a considerable increase in the number of buildings supplied with gas, and that, therefore, the force of the gas is diminished.

Mr. BUTLER. I am coming to that in a moment. It appears, then, that the position of the jets really has nothing to do with this difficulty about the eyesight of the cadets; the trouble is that the light flickers, that it is unsteady; there is power enough, as stated in this report, sometimes too much; it is not lack of power but the lack of steadiness that makes the difficulty.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I will suggest to the gentleman that there is only $2,000 asked to take out the old pipes and fixtures and put in new ones.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, allow me to get this question of mine to a focus. The difficulty, as I have said, is in the unsteadiness of the light. Now, is there anything to show that experts in gas matters have been consulted to see how that difficulty can be overcome by improving the old appliances?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. They have had experts there, and the experts have reported that the old plant can be enlarged and improved so as to make the gaslight steady, but it will require the insertion of new pipes. The pipes they have are old and worn out, and I think they are not large enough for a proper flow of gas.

Mr. BUTLER. How much will that cost?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Fifty thousand dollars will be needed for a complete outfit, refitting, and enlargement, in order to give adequate light to the Academy.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Including the $2,000 that is required to renew the pipes and fixtures. Forty-eight thousand dollars is the amount estimated for the increased plant itself, and $2,000 for the change of pipes and fixtures.

Mr. BUTLER. What is proposed in the way of increase in the plant?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. An increase in the force of the plant.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. A new building and new retorts and new machinery for the manufacture of gas, and, in some instances, larger mains than those which now exist.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will say to the gentleman further, in reply to his question, that while it is true that thirty or thirty-five years ago it was a disadvantage to have the gaslight in the position which they occupied then and still occupy, yet, the light being steady, it was then tolerable; but when you add evil after evil the accumulation of evils finally becomes intolerable, and a change becomes necessary, and then, as wise men always do in making that change and remedying one evil, they propose at the same time to remedy all other evils that they can.

It is an evil to have the lights in the positions in which they are, as I will show the gentleman from a picture of the rooms. Nevertheless, if the lights were good that evil might be borne; but, as the light is not good, the evil has become intolerable, and, it being necessary to change the gaslights and fixtures through the building, wisdom of course dictates that in doing that we shall give them droplights and slide lights, so as to have everything of the best, and we know that it will cost but very little additional to do that.

If the gentleman would examine the matter as closely as it has been investigated by the officials and by the Committee on Military Affairs, he would concede that what is recommended is in the strictest line of economy.

Mr. SIMPSON. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I always yield with pleasure to my friend.

Mr. SIMPSON. It has been stated that it will cost $2,000 to repair or replace the gas plant——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Gas fixtures.

Mr. SIMPSON. Are we to understand that the $2,000 is for putting in the pipes and the $46,000 for the plumber's time?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. No, sir; it is for materials for the work, new work entirely. The appropriation is for both work and materials.

Mr. SIMPSON. That is to protect home industry, I suppose?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Oh, we shall have everything done to protect home industry; the work will be done by American workmen, directed by American brains, and with American materials.

Mr. BROSIUS. And paid for with American money. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. The gentleman from Alabama, in reply to my question a while ago, conveyed the idea that the Government owned the land on which this work is to be done.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It owns the land which it recently purchased—about a mile in length—from what is called the south gates, the southern boundary of the old West Point grounds, to Highland Falls.

Mr. LONG. If the Government owns the ground what is the meaning of the provision that this work for which $1,300 is appropriated is to be "confined to that part of the road and walk which adjoins the land owned by the Government?"

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. That is an amendment which I improvidently inserted in the bill myself. From my recollection I did not know that the corporate limits of Highland Falls extended as far north as it does. I did not know but that the land angled off so that there might be some little space which would not be included in the land owned by the Government; so I said to the committee that we had better confine this work to the road and walk adjoining the Government property. But when I came to make further inquiry and to examine the map (for I have taken a great deal of pains to obtain information) I learned that the Government land extended to the edge of Highland Falls; but the bill having been passed by the committee I thought it unnecessary to make any change in this respect. That provision can be struck out; it is immaterial to the bill; but it does no harm.

Mr. SAYERS. Would the gentleman be willing to strike out all the appropriations for new offices and increased salaries?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, sir; all appropriations for increased salaries, provided that will satisfy my vigilant friend from Texas. I am quite as anxious as my Texas friend to reduce the appropriations to the lowest limit possible.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well, then, Mr. Chairman, it is agreed—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I do.

Mr. SAYERS. The agreement between the gentleman and myself—and I ask unanimous consent to it—is that all items in this bill which provide for new offices or increased salaries shall be considered as stricken out.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Provided that will satisfy my friend from Texas and his friends who are arrayed with him.

Mr. SAYERS. I will ask nothing more; that will satisfy me. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. That was my proviso. The gentleman is too fair to strike out a proviso which is a part of a proposition.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as we have got through with the eyesight business I want to make an allusion to another item in the bill which has been criticised. That item is $24,000 for extending and improving the sinks of the Academy. Now it is necessary for me to explain the absolute necessity for this. All the cadets take their breakfast at the same time; about twenty-five minutes before 8 o'clock, there being then about twenty-five minutes before they go to recitation. The first captain gives the command to those young men to "break ranks, march." The 300 men rush as fast as their feet can carry them, for the purpose of reaching the locality where the sinks are. As only 40 can be accommodated, 260 must wait, possibly the greater part of the day, before they can get accommodation.

Now the physicians have reported that in consequence of this condition of things there is most serious injury to the health of those young men; that it is absolutely necessary there should be enlarged facilities in this regard. I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything more on that subject, except to repeat that year after year the physicians have asserted that the health of those young men has suffered materially for want of proper buildings of that character. I say it is a shame and a disgrace that young men sent there by our members of Congress should be compelled to submit to such deprivation. I will ask the Clerk to read the portion of the report which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Cadet sink.—The sketch herewith shows arrangement of cadet sink, which contains forty closets of the pan style and twenty urinals. Every effort appears to have been made to keep the premises clean; but the arrangement is extremely faulty and can not but be offensive, as the pipes and fixtures are without ventilation and the closets are not provided with a proper flush. I would recommend that the present closets be replaced with short hoppers, provided each with a fore-and-after flushing tank; that each group of urinals be provided with an automatic flushing tank, and that the main soil pipe be carried as near the closets as is consistent with a proper fall. A trap with fresh-air inlet should be provided on the main soil pipe where it enters the sewer, and the pipe should be carried full size for some distance above the roof and a special ventilating pipe provided from the traps. The floor of this room should be of stone laid in cement, and inclined toward a point and there trapped off from the sewer. This arrangement will give opportunity to thoroughly wash the place out by means of hose.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will state to the committee that the Committee on Military Affairs, after incorporating these items that in their judgment were so essential to the maintenance of the health of the cadets, in order to reduce this bill have struck out items amounting in the aggregate to about $100,000, which have been certified to two different Congresses as absolutely essential to the comfort of the officers and men stationed there. We struck out, for instance, $3,000 for continuing the repairs on married men's quarters. We struck out $6,000 for a set of officers' quarters that are reported as absolutely essential because of the small houses in which they are quartered; they have two sets of officers' families crowded together in a space that no member of Congress would allow himself or his family to be crowded into at any time.

Then there are the married enlisted men. For several years there has been a demand for proper quarters for them, and the Secretary of War urged that this item for married enlisted men's quarters, costing $9,000, should be allowed. But we struck that out in order to bring about an economy as far as possible to do so. We then reduced the estimates for modernizing the sewerage $3,000. We reduced the appropriations for bathrooms and sinks $4,700. The clerk to the adjutant, who ought to be at the post but has no quarters there, although recommendations to that effect have been frequently made, and they have recommended in the present estimates $3,000 for that work. This has also been stricken out by us.

Then the teacher of music and the master of the sword: they are gentlemen of the very highest attainments in their profession, men of a standing which should give them the same consideration that is given to officers, and for two or three years past it has been urged upon Congress that a double set of quarters costing $10,000 should be built for their accommodation. But that is also stricken out. Then the repairs of quarters for the battalion of engineers, $3,500, we have also struck out. Then there are several other small items, which I will not read, which have also been stricken out.

We also struck out $2,800, new sewer from Rugertown. We also struck out the $1,300 which was recommended for a new sewer from Logtown. We also struck out $6,840 recommended for a new 10-inch water main from the corner of cadet barracks to south gate. We also struck out $1,800 which was asked for building a breast-high masonry wall on east side of road from north gate to entrance to post cemetery. We also materially reduced the appropriation for improving the subsoil and surface drainage, etc.

The soldiers' bath house, regarded as essential, we have struck out. If the Government employs soldiers at all, it is of the utmost importance that the private soldier should have good bathing facilities, but this bath house proposed an expenditure of $4,450 and we struck it out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask just three minutes longer to complete this statement.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope that will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, when interrupted I was speaking about the soldiers' bathroom. You know where you have a building in which many men sleep, and in one room, it is absolutely essential that the utmost cleanliness should be observed and facilities given for that purpose; and yet the estimate for the soldiers' bathroom has been stricken out in our efforts to economize. And we have stricken out other items, on down, until we come to the officials that were the clerks of the Academy, some of them for forty years, and one of them succeeded a paymaster and performed the duties of paymaster. And this paymaster who performed the duties prior to the present incumbent must have cost the Government from $4,000 to $5,000 annually.

This clerk to the disbursing officer was originally paid $1,650 per annum. In 1877 his pay was reduced from $1,650 to $1,200; it was afterwards raised to $1,500, and this bill reduces it to $1,200. The pay of the clerk to the adjutant and the pay of the clerk to the treasurer was $1,500 each for many years prior to 1877; their pay was then reduced to $1,200; it was afterwards restored to $1,500, and this bill reduces it again to $1,200. The clerk to the adjutant has been employed since May, 1851. These reductions have been made by the committee in the interest of economy.

Now, in the moment I have at my disposal, I shall ask to have read at the desk the last paragraph of the report of the last Board of Visitors sent to the Academy, which alludes to this subject, and appeals to Congress and appeals to the country—for we all advocate economy—not to adopt false economy and deny absolute necessities to this important institution.

You criticise this bill because it appropriates some $90,000 for permanent improvements which are actually essential to the well-being of the Academy.

In one or two months these same men will be dragging into the House bills which appropriate millions upon millions for purposes of very questionable merit. They will ask a million dollars for this building, two millions for this, and half a million for another building, and millions for other appropriations which could be omitted without serious detriment to the Government. Some of these same men voted for the return of the direct tax and the French spoliation bills.

I want to say to the House, and to the Committee on Appropriations, who have to wrestle with some $350,000,000 to $450,000,000 appropriation, that this little bill, which does not appropriate one dollar to five thousand in bills which they have in charge, is not the place to commence the character of attack which some of these gentlemen seem disposed to inaugurate under the false idea of pretended economy. The country demands economy; it demands wise economy; but it does not demand, and will not tolerate or sustain injudicious and ill-advised reductions in matters of this kind, which, under the name of economy, does a serious injury to an institution in which the whole country feels a just pride.

I ask the Clerk to read what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Board earnestly commends the Military Academy to the fostering care of Congress and the liberal support of the people. It is the only national military school we have, and nothing should be left undone to maintain its high character, promote its efficiency, and increase its usefulness. National pride, regard for the common defense, and sound public policy require that its equipment should be thorough, and that the highest patriotism and best talent should continue to characterize its direction. Its graduates in the past have met every requirement of the public service, and there can be no manner of doubt that should occasion arise West Point will in the future fully meet the expectations of the American people. No consideration of economy should be permitted to thwart or delay the furnishing of proper supplies and equipment so urgently needed to place the Military Academy abreast of similar institutions in other countries.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I desire to say that I have endeavored to answer every question propounded to me. I have gladly yielded to every gentleman who had any inquiry to propound or any suggestion to make. I hope the matters inquired about have been satisfactorily explained. The Committee on Military Affairs regret that the duty of bringing the first appropriation bill before Congress was imposed upon them. They expected the broadsides of artillery which are always brought to bear upon the appropriation bill which is first up for consideration, but they have the satisfaction of knowing that this bill is capable of standing the closest investigation and scrutiny, and they only ask that the House will accord the bill intelligent and fair consideration.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I only desire the attention of the House for a few minutes. It has been alleged in some quarters that there was possibly some division in the Democratic ranks upon the silver question. It has also been intimated that there was some difference as to the methods of tariff revision, but I have not yet seen it charged in the columns of the Republican press or heard the statement by any gentleman on this floor that there was any division upon this side of the House in respect to the necessity for judicious economy in the disbursement of public money. I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, but that every gentleman on this side of the main aisle, as well as the overlapping Democracy on the other side——

Mr. REED. Why not say "lapping" instead of "overlapping?"

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, we did indulge in some "lapping" in 1890, as the gentleman from Maine will remember.

Mr. Chairman, every gentleman on this side has united in the chorus of denunciation of the stupendous aggregate of the appropriations of what has passed into history as the billion-dollar Congress. I do not believe that there is a Democrat on this floor who indorsed the lavish appropriations of the last session. And yet, Mr. Chairman, the very first general appropriation bill that comes from a Democratic committee in this House carries $63,730.54 more of appropriations than were carried by a similar bill in the last Congress.

The question therefore for Democratic Representatives to consider, is whether we shall keep the pledges made to the people in 1890, when they demanded economy, or whether we will approve this bill, reported by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], adding as it does $64,000 to the burdens of the taxpayers of the United States, and taking second rank in its aggregate with all the bills that have heretofore been reported providing for the support of the Military Academy.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama: Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Will not the first public building bill that may come in the House, that may appropriate say a half a million of dollars, be the first measure of that character that comes from this Congress, and will it not be a half a million dollars greater than was ever appropriated for that same thing before?

Mr. DOCKERY. I did not catch the question of the gentleman.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Will not the first public building bill which comes before this House, appropriating say a half a million dollars, be an appropriation of a half a million dollars more than ever was appropriated for that same purpose? [Laughter.]

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, what public building bills are coming before the House. I have not examined the Calendar. Perhaps the gentleman has information that I have not; but I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, in justice to the Secretary of the Treasury, that the paragraph recommended by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], providing for "enlarging and increasing gas plant and for placing a two-light pendant with slide light in each cadet room," was disapproved by the Secretary of the Treasury. It has no place in the estimates; but finds a place in the bill, after the gentleman from Alabama called upon the Secretary of War. The letter which he read and which I now return to him is in no sense an estimate as required by law. Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but——

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will ask the gentleman if all the estimates for all the appropriations for the Army and for the Military Academy do not come from the Secretary of War?

Mr. DOCKERY. Every estimate is submitted to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. But it is made up by the office of the Secretary of War, by the military officers.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly; but the Secretary of the Treasury passes upon the sufficiency of all estimates. Secretary Foster passed upon this identical estimate and disapproved it.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The gentleman is mistaken. I will say, as a matter of fact, that the Secretary of War held it in abeyance until it was determined whether there should be a new gas plant or an enlargement of the gas plant.

Mr. DOCKERY. But, Mr. Chairman, the estimate does not appear in the Book of Estimates, and that is evidence of its disapproval.

Now, Mr. Chairman, another item: On page 7 there are ten new offices created, at a cost of $4,800, whilst a provision for "soap to be used in scrubbing cadet barracks" appears for the first time. These new provisions will take from the Treasury of the United States $4,850.

A MEMBER. I hope no Democrat will object to the use of "soap."

Mr. WALKER. Does the gentleman move to strike out the "soap"?

Mr. DOCKERY. I anticipated an interruption on that side. It has been alleged, as gentlemen will remember, that our friends have been quite proficient in the use of "soap." Something has heretofore been said about its use in the State of Indiana.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does the gentleman refer to those immediately on this side?

Mr. DOCKERY. No, on this side of the "Cherokee strip" and just beyond the first row of Democrats. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I was about to say when interrupted, on page 7 there is a provision for ten new offices and an appropriation for "soap," the effect of which is to take $4,850 from the taxpayers and add it to the salary of the cadets. Heretofore the salaries of barracks policemen have been paid by the cadets, as I now remember.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. How much is for soap and how much for new offices?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Are you not mistaken in stating that this bill creates ten new officers? Are not those barrack policemen provided for in former appropriation bills.

Mr. SAYERS. Can the gentleman show in his last appropriation bill any provision for the payment of these ten policemen for that purpose?

Mr. DOCKERY. I do not think it has appeared in former bills.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. If the gentleman will allow me I can explain that——

Mr. DOCKERY. Ten new offices have been created at this point, and yet we have been denouncing the Republican party all along the line for creating 1,305 more new offices, and increasing the salaries of 432 more, at an annual increased cost of $1,701,681.62, as compared with the Fiftieth Congress.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope the gentleman will make his apology now. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOCKERY. I shall feel inclined to tender an apology if this House fails to strike from the bill its objectionable items.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in this connection the question naturally presents itself to the minds of Representatives whether the condition of the Treasury is such as to warrant any unusual expenditure. Admitting, however, for the sake of the argument that some increased expenditure ought to be made, the question presents itself whether, in the present condition of the Treasury, we can afford to launch out upon any new enterprises.

Now, what is the condition of the Treasury? On the first of the present year, it being the close of the first six months of this fiscal year, the expenditures of the Government had exceeded its revenues for the period stated more than $200,000.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to one item?

Mr. DOCKERY. In just a moment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It is on page 6, No. 1. Please look at it:

For the purchase of one hundred saddlecloths for the use of the cadets, $500.

That is $5 apiece for saddlecloths.

Mr. DOCKERY. That seems to be a little high, but I am now directing my remarks to another branch of the subject.

I want to say now, and I challenge successful contradiction, that at the beginning of this calendar year, it being as I have heretofore stated, the close of the first half of the fiscal year, the expenditures of the Government exceeded its revenues more than $200,000. I challenge denial.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman pardon me if I interrupt him there? Does not the gentleman include in the ordinary expenditures of the Government $7,000,000 and more paid out on account of the redemption fund, which has been used in the reduction of the public debt? That is not a part of the "ordinary expenditures."

Mr. DOCKERY. Gentlemen will bear me witness that I did not use the words "ordinary expenditures," I referred to the "expenditures," and I do not care whether they be classed as "ordinary" or "extraordinary," inasmuch as they are paid out of the income.

Mr. DINGLEY. But he used it in the sense of the ordinary expenses, including all the funds that were paid out in payment of the public debt.

Mr. DOCKERY. The expenditures should include everything except the redemption of Government bonds. As their proceeds were originally deposited in the Treasury, it would make a double charge to include their redemption in the total of expenditures.

Mr. DINGLEY. But it was all paid for the reduction of the public debt.

Mr. DOCKERY. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman possibly has forgotten section 6 of the act covering the national-bank deposit fund into the public Treasury.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have not forgotten it; but I think that the gentleman has.

Mr. DOCKERY. If he has not forgotten it, he will remember that the act expressly provides that the money deposited for the redemption of national-bank notes shall be covered into the general Treasury——

Mr. DINGLEY. And how was it used?

Mr. DOCKERY. Let me complete my statement. The notes must be redeemed from the general Treasury. That is the command of the law. Now, if I understand the position of the gentleman from Maine, after having covered the $54,207,975.75 of money belonging to the holders of national-bank notes into the Treasury, and after having added to that amount $11,045,013 that has been deposited since, thus using the amount to pay ordinary current expenses——

Mr. DINGLEY. Not a dollar of it was used for ordinary current expenses.

Mr. DOCKERY. After pursuing that course with the national-bank redemption fund, he would now seem to desire to eliminate it from the statement of receipts and expenditures because the expenditures exceed receipts. The gentleman proposes to evade the plain requirements of section 6 of the silver act. If the gentleman has any doubt about it I will read it to him.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before the gentleman passes from that, do I understand him to assert that any part of the $54,000,000 covered into the Treasury by the act of July 14, 1890, has been used for the ordinary expenditures of the Government?

Mr. DOCKERY. Why, certainly; and if the gentleman will examine the Treasury statement he will find this to be true. Indeed, if that fund had not been used there would be but $18,082.79 in the Treasury now.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not a dollar of it has been used for ordinary expenses——

Mr. DOCKERY. Not only this, Mr. Chairman, but if the $25,364,500 of 4½ per cent bonds had not been extended without warrant of law there would be an actual deficiency of more than $25,000,000.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, will the gentleman, right at that point, pardon me?

Mr. DOCKERY. I think I can better state this question by reading from a recent report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. DINGLEY. I want to call the attention of the gentleman——.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, let me complete my statement. On the 14th of January the gentleman from Iowa replied to some observations that I made. I quote now from Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa, who asserted that I was in error in the statement that "the receipts fell short of the expenditures of the Government for the first half of the fiscal year."

Mr. DINGLEY rose.

Mr. DOCKERY. Will the gentleman from Maine please allow me to complete my statement?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will take my own time.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] then submitted a statement from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, giving the "ordinary" receipts and expenditures of the Government, in which it appeared that, limiting the exhibit to the "ordinary" receipts and expenditures, there was a surplus of $7,100,308.22, instead of a deficiency exceeding $200,000. Now, Mr. Chairman, the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to a letter addressed to him by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee on the 4th of this month, sent to that committee a statement of the receipts and expenditures, including the receipts and expenditures on account of national-bank notes. This exhibit verifies the absolute accuracy of the statement I made on the 14th of last month, when I asserted that the expenditures of the first half of the present fiscal year were in excess of the receipts. I will incorporate the letter of the Acting Secretary in my remarks.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 4, 1892.

Acting Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM M. SPRINGER,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire also to call attention to the Treasury statement of the first of the present month. I especially ask the attention of Democrats, inasmuch as I know it is not a very pleasant subject for our Republican friends. [Laughter.] Here is the Treasury statement—an original document—I received on the second of this month, showing that, for the first seven months of the current fiscal year, the expenditures of the Government exceeded its revenues $5,359,578.78.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, WARRANT DIVISION,
February 1, 1892.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Does that include the national-bank redemption fund?

Mr. DOCKERY. It includes the national-bank redemption fund. It includes everything except the payments out of the surplus in the Treasury on account of the redemption of Government bonds.

Mr. WALKER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly.

Mr. WALKER. Do I understand you to use "expenditures" as including all money paid out, without reference to what it was paid out for?

Mr. DOCKERY. I use the term "expenditures" just as the Treasury Department uses it. If the gentleman will examine this statement he will see how it is used by the Department. This is the title: "Comparative statement of the receipts and expenditures of the United States." Under "Receipts," according to Form 109 in use in the Treasury Department, there appears the item of "National-bank deposit fund," whilst under the head of "Expenditures" is exhibited the "National-bank fund redemption account."

Mr. WALKER. Which clearly means money received and paid out; not expenditure in the nature of expenses, but simply money received and paid out.

Mr. DOCKERY. Certainly, it means money received and paid out. I do not know of any better definition that could be given. "Receipts" means money received and "expenditures" means money paid out.

Mr. WALKER. Does the gentleman understand that——

Mr. DOCKERY. I accept the gentleman's definition. He need not try to improve it. [Laughter.] It is first-class and it is also Democratic. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another matter I desire to call to the attention of gentlemen on this side of the House especially. I would not offend our Republican friends by a recital of this unfortunate situation if I could avoid it, but I am constrained to appeal to Democrats in view of the present condition of the Treasury to be economical, and in so doing I am compelled to harrow in some degree the sensitive feelings of our Republican friends. [Laughter.] In connection with this appropriation bill I want to call attention to the fact that many obligations were imposed by the Fifty-first Congress, obligations which we must meet, and therefore the paramount necessity for economy.

For illustration, in the matter of public buildings the billion-dollar Congress imposed $8,160,000 of liabilities for which they did not appropriate a dollar. This includes $2,000,000 for the Philadelphia mint, and $1,600,000 to erect the three Federal prisons, neither bill carrying any appropriation. Another obligation imposed upon us by that Congress, which we must meet at least in part, amounts to $11,331,779 on an account of rivers and harbors. I will not refer to the liabilities carried by the naval bill, inasmuch as it is impossible at this time to accurately estimate that aggregate.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I will say that it is apparent, it is beyond cavil, that unless this Democratic House is true to the traditions of the party and holds a tight rein upon the purse-strings of the Government we shall have an actual deficiency within the next twelve months. It seems that the Treasury officials are apprehensive. Look at the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury. He eliminates the river and harbor requirements from the estimates for the ensuing fiscal year, whilst omitting in his estimates the sinking fund for the next year, which calls for about $49,000,000, at the same time failing to provide for about $11,000,000 of the sinking fund for the current year.

Mr. Chairman, I appeal to Democratic Representatives, whose seats were filled by the popular demand for reform in public expenditures, to strike from this bill all those provisions which are not absolutely essential for the support of the Military Academy for the ensuing fiscal year.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. Before the gentleman from Missouri takes his seat, I wish to say to him, if he will permit me, that I do not understand what he means by his statement that the "billion-dollar Congress," as he calls it, imposed upon the Democrats in this Congress an appropriation of $2,000,000 to build a new mint in the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. DOCKERY. I mean to say, if my friend will allow me, that at the second session of the last Congress a bill was passed authorizing the construction of a mint at Philadelphia, the cost not to exceed $2,000,000, but by an error in the bill no appropriation was provided.

Mr. O'NEILL of Pennsylvania. By the action of one of the Comptrollers of the Treasury it was decided that no appropriation was carried by the bill, that officer being very much mistaken, I think, in his judgment. But the $2,000,000 which that mint was expected to cost should not be charged up against the "billion-dollar Congress" by the gentleman from Missouri. I only wish it could be.

Mr. DOCKERY. There seems to be no controversy as to the facts between the gentleman and myself.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT].

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, in addition to what has been said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] by way of portraying the present situation of the Treasury, I wish to call attention to the Book of Estimates, page 161, in which there is asked by way of appropriations, in excess of those made for the present fiscal year, $12,000,000. I mean to say that the amount appropriated for the year ending June 30, 1892, was $135,000,000; and for the next fiscal year $12,000,000 in excess of that sum is asked. This fact of itself places this House in the presence of a prospective deficiency in the Treasury.

The gentleman from Missouri has already called attention to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury, for the first time in more than twenty years, is proposing to suspend payments to the sinking fund. And all this at a time when, with increased rates of taxation, our receipts are reduced. This House, therefore, comes into power with the fact of a deficiency confronting it, and with the announcement on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury that there are to be for the present no more contributions to the sinking fund.

Mr. Chairman, I care not so much about the present bill. I know that the road to economy is a homely one. I well remember the struggles in the Forty-fourth Congress on this subject. All along the line, wherever reductions were proposed, it was constantly cried out from the opposition that this was a "picayune" method of treating public affairs, that it was an unworthy process of "paring." I well remember that on every bill, from the very first to the very last, we were flooded with letters from Department officials—from heads of Departments and heads of bureaus—showing how we were going to wreck the public service everywhere.

The debates of that Congress on the Military Academy bill, the Post-Office bill, the Army bill, the Navy bill, the sundry civil bill are flooded all along the line with protests from Department officers; and the Senate accepted the theories of the Departments and confronted us with arguments manufactured there. Yet this House, with steady nerve and determined purpose, in spite of these criticisms, moved on, and by these homely methods made reductions amounting to $30,000,000. And, gentlemen, it is over this same path that you are to travel if you reach reduction in the present Congress. The condition of the people themselves is a homely picture, especially in the great agricultural sections of this country. They will not find in the proposition for reduction on these bills all along the line anything strange or contrary to their own experience.

I remember, Mr. Chairman (for I happened to be at that time a member of the Appropriations Committee), that when we were taking up these various bills there was in the minority of the committee a gentleman distinguished for ability and integrity, who was afterwards elected Vice-President of the United States—Mr. Wheeler of New York. He was an experienced member of this House; he had long been a member of the Committee on Appropriations; and with a frankness which was characteristic of the man he said to us in the beginning, "Gentleman, if you want to reduce the expenditures of the Government, you can accomplish it only by your own exertions in that direction, for not a single cabinet officer will aid you." Nothing came from cabinet officers or heads of bureaus in the way of suggestion for our assistance. It was all protest. So now we must tread this path of reduction alone. We must accomplish reduction by courageous adherence to a policy of strict economy and by an acceptance of the hard situation which must result from the attitude of our opponents.

If we are not to work out this reform, then let us now make the fact known to each other. There never was a single appropriation bill presented to the House in the Forty-fourth Congress when some gentleman on one side or the other did not make the suggestion "This bill is reasonable; make your reduction on some other bill; find some larger way of economizing—something more in accord with a broad, liberal mind."

And I well remember, Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox], retorting to criticisms of gentlemen on the other side of the House, declared "Oh, yes, you are always in favor of economy, but you never get to the bill you want to reduce on." The only way to do it, Mr. Chairman, is to begin at the beginning, to make reasonable reductions all along the line.

I have great respect for the intelligence of my distinguished friend from Alabama. I think, perhaps, if there was no question as to the condition of the finances of the country, I should not find myself, nor would I expect to find other gentlemen, critically examining this bill. The purpose I have in relation to the matter is to commence now, not to consider West Point alone, but to consider the whole country; its condition, the policy of the party, and on this, as on other bills, to begin and shape ourselves to reach that result we have all declared ourselves in favor of.

My friend from Alabama has referred to the condition of the gas works at West Point, and says that the eyes of the students have become very bad in consequence of defective light. It is not clear exactly what caused this trouble. At one time it is the gas works; at another it is the severe course of study required of all students; more hours of study.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It is both.

Mr. BLOUNT. More hours of study than formerly, and now the gentleman from Alabama says it is both.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. If they had no studies they would want no gas works. The people who study must have light.

Mr. BLOUNT. I know that I happened to have the honor of going twice as a member of the Board of Visitors, to West Point. I have some knowledge of the place; and I am quite sure that there is just as much ingenuity at West Point in the matter of getting money out of the Treasury as you will find here in the city of Washington. You may look over the reports for years past, and only within the last two years has this discovery been made that the boys were getting blind on account of the bad gaslight.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Will the gentleman allow me one moment?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. NEWBERRY. Will the gentleman bear in mind the fact that in 1890 a Democratic Congress appropriated $902,000 and more——

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir; and let me say——

Mr. NEWBERRY. Let me complete my statement. They appropriated this sum to extend the buildings, but they forgot to connect the gas works and the sewers with them, and it is left now for this Congress to do it. This bill includes those items; and for that reason, and that alone, these items of the gas works and sewer have necessarily been put in and make up this large apparent increase.

Mr. BLOUNT. I submit to the House now, in the light of the debate which has just occurred, whether the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Illinois agree in their views of this subject. The gentleman from Illinois has just submitted one reason for this condition of things, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] explained to us the reason for this expenditure on quite another ground. Which is correct? The language of the bill provides that these works shall be entirely renewed; so that the gentlemen who have given such extreme care to the subject, and who have taken care to append it in the report, even now do not seem to act together or agree in their conclusion.

Mr. NEWBERRY. If you will permit me, I will explain——

Mr. BLOUNT. I would do so with pleasure if I had time. I am sure it would take a great deal of time to explain or harmonize such statements or reasons to the House.

Mr. NEWBERRY. I will take only a moment of the gentleman's time.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman will no doubt have ample opportunity to explain hereafter. It is not a very abstruse question.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think, in view of the fact that prior to two years ago there had been no suggestion as to the bad effect of this system of gas works on the eyes of the boys, that it could have grown to be so serious a matter in so short a time. You will find for years in every West Point Academy bill provisions for renewing and repairing the gas works, and while they may have been originally constructed thirty-odd years ago, there has been annually a considerable expenditure of money to keep the works in perfect order. The age, then, has nothing whatever to do with it. It seems to me, knowing as I do the inventive genius in the matter of obtaining appropriations from every direction where the Administration has any control, that this is not an exception, and that we may leave this item out of the bill without injury.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? I believe the gentleman from Georgia, in a very eloquent speech the other day in speaking of the Post-Office Department, said that the only question for our consideration was, Is it necessary? Now, I ask him to confine himself to that line, as near as he can, in discussing this question. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLOUNT. I am trying to get my friend there. I have been trying to do it all along, and I do not believe it is necessary to do what my friend is asking now in the matter of these gas works.

And there are several other items concerning which I think the same thing. My friend has taken occasion to refer to the provision for the cadets. He has said something about officers' quarters. Why, notwithstanding they were so magnificent, as I thought, a few years ago, in 1879 and 1884, when I was there, and notwithstanding they were the delight of the Board of Visitors, there have been additions in 1891 for officers' quarters, two more sets of officers' quarters, that seemed magnificent and ample then, $20,000; for twenty sets of quarters for enlisted men and their families, to be built in sets of twos, of brick, $24,000. So in the year before you will find ten sets of quarters for enlisted men and their families, to be built in sets of twos, of brick, each to contain four rooms, $20,000. For the construction of a hospital for enlisted men, $30,000. And you may take up this little school and you will find, in my opinion, that all along the line the expenditures made by the Government have been generous. And, sir, it seems to me that in several items the gentlemen of the committee have seen fit to make increases over the bill of last year. I refer now to smaller items.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed at 5 o'clock.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand that I am to be recognized next.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that general debate be closed at 5 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Kentucky. I think we had better let it run on for awhile. There may be something we may want to talk about.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky objects. The gentleman from Maine——

Mr. DOCKERY. I had intended to yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] ten minutes at this time.

Mr. SAYERS. All that I want is ten minutes.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have no objection to the gentleman from Texas taking that time before I take the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] desires to yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] will be recognized later.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to confine my remarks entirely to this bill. It was understood between the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] and myself, that he would agree to strike out all of the increased salaries, as well as the new offices.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Provided that would satisfy my friend from Texas. That was my individual statement.

Mr. SAYERS. Yet on the first page of the bill we find an increase of salaries amounting to $252.77.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. That is a matter provided by law, which we can not change.

Mr. SAYERS. We find in the paragraph beginning in line 25, on page 3, an increase in that item over the bill of the last Congress of $1,000.

On page 5, line 7, we find a new item covering $1,500.

In lines 23 and 24, page 5, we find a new item covering $120.

On page 6, lines 1 to 6, inclusive, we find new items amounting to $700.

In line 25, page 6, we find a new office created, amounting to $720 per annum; and from line 3 to line 7, on page 7, we find ten new offices, at an annual cost of $4,200.

In line 8 of the same page, we find another new item costing $50.

On lines 13, 14, and 15 of page 9 we find an item with an increase of $125.

On lines 16 and 17, an increase of $50.

In lines 22 and 23, an increase of $50.

On page 11, lines 14 to 18, inclusive, we find a new item amounting to $2,500.

On page 12, lines 1 to 3, we find another increase of $19.25, and in the three following lines an increase of $156.40.

On page 13, lines 1 to 3, inclusive, we find a new item amounting to $156.50, and on lines 6 to 10, inclusive, of page 13, an increase of $1,500.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Will you read the decreases all along, too.

Mr. SAYERS. I will give you the net increases.

In lines 7 and 8 of page 14 we find an increase of $100; in lines 10 and 11, a new office created, with a salary of $800 per annum.

In the twelfth line a new office is created, with a salary of $900 per annum.

Items 18, 19, and 20, on page 14, are increases over the bill of last year of $100, and lines 23 and 24 contain a new item, in the shape of an organ for the chapel, amounting to $900.

On page 15, lines 14, 15 16, and 17, we find an item of increase amounting to $150.

On page 16, in lines 11, 12, 13, and 14, we find an increase of $700.

In lines 1 and 2, page 17, an increase over the current year of $500.

In lines 13, 14, 15, and 16, as stated by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], there is an amount of $50,000, for which there has been no estimate sent to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. What item is that?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The estimate for a part of it was made by the Secretary of the Treasury, and for the whole amount by the Secretary of War.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me, in view of the present condition of the Treasury, and of the country, that the Committee on Military Affairs should have been willing, at least, to bring their bill within the limits prescribed by the act for the support of the Academy during the present year. Instead of that they have gone along, and, after allowing them credit for all their reductions, we find that they have increased the amount carried by this bill to the extent of $53,399.30.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. And $98,000 is for permanent improvements, of great value; and in other directions we have reduced the expenditures $43,000.

Mr. SAYERS. Could not these permanent improvements have been postponed for another year without any detriment?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. We feel that it would be a crime to postpone the improvements that are to give light to the students to study by.

Mr. SAYERS. Having called the attention of the committee to these several increases of amounts and the creation of new offices, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY].

Mr. DOCKERY. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has three minutes remaining of his ten minutes.

Mr. DOCKERY. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] was speaking a short time ago he made a statement to the effect that $54,000,000 of the bank redemption fund which was covered into the Treasury under the act of July 14, 1890, had been used for the ordinary expenses of the Government, in addition to the current revenue. I interrupted him, by his permission, to say that he was mistaken with reference to that, but he insisted that his statement was correct. I repeat now, that not one dollar of the bank redemption fund has been used for any other purpose than the reduction of the principal of the public debt.

Gentlemen will bear in mind that this bank redemption fund was deposited in the Treasury as a quasi-trust fund, under the national-bank act, by national banks reducing their circulation and banks in liquidation, to redeem their outstanding notes to the extent of the withdrawal of bonds, and that at one time—in August, 1887—it reached the aggregate of nearly $106,000,000, and on March 1, 1889, was $82,577,000. When the sum had reached the largest amount, in the Forty-ninth Congress, I believe, I introduced into the House a bill providing that the fund should be covered into the Treasury for use in the purchase of bonds. I had two objects in view: First, that the currency of the country might not be contracted by the deposit of so great a volume of legal tenders, and, secondly, that the people might have the benefit of the interest upon the idle fund.

While there was a general disposition in both the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses to pass this act, and it was favorably reported, yet it did not become a law because a few gentlemen who controlled the order of business would not give it the right of way. But in the Fifty-first Congress, at the first session, this measure became a law as one of the sections of what is known as the silver-bullion purchase act.

Under that act, on the 14th day of July, 1890, $54,207,975, what remained of these trust funds after the payment of notes presented up to that time for redemption, was covered into the Treasury and became available, the Government undertaking to redeem the remaining notes as presented. For what purpose was it used? Obviously, Mr. Chairman, it could not have been used for the current expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, for the revenue of the Government for that year was $37,239,762 more than the expenditures; and that thirty-seven millions was devoted to the reduction of the public debt. Not only this, but the $54,207,975 of the bank redemption fund covered into the Treasury on the 14th day of July, 1890, was also used for the purpose of reducing the public debt; for between the 1st day of July, 1890, and the 1st day of January, 1892, there was applied to the redemption of the public debt the sum of $139,315,543. Where did the funds come from? From the $54,207,975 of the bank redemption fund, from the $37,239,762 of surplus revenue for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, and the balance from the surplus in the Treasury on the 30th day of June, 1890.

Now, in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1891, as I have already said, there was no necessity for using a dollar of this bank redemption fund for current expenditures, because the revenue of the Government exceeded the expenditures by over $37,000,000. For the six months of the present fiscal year ending December 31, 1891, excluding, of course, the payment of $7,339,093 in excess of deposits on account of the bank redemption fund, the revenue exceeded the expenditures by $7,065,629; and this surplus was used in the reduction of the principal of the public debt. In the first six months of the present fiscal year over twenty three million of the 4½ per cent bonds were paid, and about twenty-five millions extended at 2 per cent interest, payable at the pleasure of the Government.

Evidently the payment on account of this bank redemption fund was not for ordinary current expenditures, but for the reduction of the public debt, because the fund which it supplied had been used for the latter purpose. In the six months ending December 31, 1891, there was deposited in the Treasury by the banks reducing their circulation and banks in liquidation $1,601,390. There was paid out in the same period, for the redemption of the national-bank notes for which the deposits had been made, the sum of $8,940,491, leaving a balance of $7,065,629 to be paid from the Treasury, and to be charged to the redemption of the public debt, because the fund from which it would have been paid had been used by the Government in buying or redeeming the bonded debt.

The payments on account of this bank fund are treated by the Secretary of the Treasury, not as ordinary expenditures, but as payments on account of the public debt. I hold in my hand the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury. On page 1 the Secretary gives a statement of the receipts and expenditures for the current fiscal year. In those receipts the deposits of national banks reducing their circulation and in liquidation is not included. A separate account of that item is kept in the Treasury because it is an item chargeable really to the reduction of the public debt. In the expenditures for that period the payments on account of that fund are not placed, because they are not ordinary current expenditures, but an expenditure precisely like the money that is devoted to the reduction of the principal of the public debt. In fairness, no gentleman should quote upon this floor a payment that is chargeable to the reduction of the public debt as an item of current ordinary expenditure.

Now, for the six months ending December 31, 1891, the expenditures were $7,065,629 less than the revenue. If there is to be included in this the $7,339,093 paid on account of the bank redemption fund, of course it would make a deficit of $273,464, and if all the payment on account of reduction of public debt should also be included, the so-called deficit would be much more. But that is not, as I have already said, a proper charge to current expenditures, but one to be placed to the account of the reduction of the public debt.

On the 1st day of January, therefore, the revenue for the first six months of the present fiscal year exceeded the ordinary expenditures, including the interest on the public debt, by $7,065,629, as appears by the following official statement:

Comparative statement of receipts and expenditures from June 30, 1891, to December 31, 1891, and the same period in the fiscal year 1890.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] in the course of his speech took occasion to denounce the last Congress as "the billion-dollar Congress," which had imposed upon the country extravagant appropriations; and in a previous speech he stated that the increase of appropriations by the last Congress over those of the preceding Congress was $194,000,000. Now, Mr. Chairman, such charges as these have gone on about long enough to merit something more than a categorical denial. What are the facts about this matter?

Let me point out the way in which gentlemen are enabled to make such allegations. I have before me the statement of the appropriations by several Congresses, presented by the gentleman from Missouri as the basis of his charge, for the two fiscal years which each Congress covers, from the Forty-seventh to the present. This statement, which has been repeatedly published, was prepared by the clerks of the House Committee on Appropriations and of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, and when properly used will lead to correct conclusions.

Now the gentleman takes that statement and quotes simply the footings, ignoring the notes, and makes it appear that the appropriations of the Fifty-first Congress were $170,000,000 more than the appropriations of the Fiftieth Congress; and then adds to this sum so much as he thinks will be required for deficiencies to be supplied and indefinite appropriations not included in the estimates.

The aggregate appropriations by the several Congresses from the Forty-seventh to the Fifty-first, inclusive, as given in the table prepared by the clerks of the Senate and House Appropriations Committees and submitted by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] as the basis of his charge, including not only the general appropriation bills but also estimated permanent and indefinite appropriations, were as follows:

Forty-seventh Congress, for 1883 and 1884	$777,435,948
Forty-eighth Congress, for 1885 and 1886	655,269,402
Forty-ninth Congress, for 1887 and 1888	746,342,496
Fiftieth Congress, for 1889 and 1890	817,963,860
Fifty-first Congress, for 1891 and 1892	988,417,183

To this last the gentleman added $19,000,000, and subsequently $24,000,000 for deficiencies and indefinite appropriations, carrying up his aggregate for the Fifty-first Congress to over a billion of dollars. This was the basis of his charge that the appropriations of the Fifty-first Congress were one hundred and ninety-four millions more than those of the Fiftieth.

There were appended to this table certain notes which greatly modified the meaning of these figures, which the gentleman from Missouri ignored. If he had examined these notes he would have observed statements which would have clearly shown that these footings required correction. What is the first fact that he would have found? That of the appropriations of the last Congress over thirty-eight and a half million dollars—to be exact, $38,617,448—were deficiencies which the previous Congress ought to have provided for. Now, if thirty-eight and a half million dollars be deducted from the appropriations of the last Congress and charged to the prior Congress, where they belong, that would make a very serious correction of the gentleman's statement. Why, Mr. Chairman, there is no more deceptive way of undertaking to determine what are the expenditures for any two fiscal years that may come under one Congress than to assume that the footing up of the appropriation bills of the two sessions of such Congress determines the matter. It does not determine it, and why not? Suppose this Congress, for example——

Mr. TURNER. Will the gentleman from Maine tell us what the deficiencies of the Fifty-first Congress will be?

Mr. DINGLEY. I will consider them when I reach that point in the discussion.

Mr. TURNER. Let us compare them at this point.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will come to that later. Suppose, I say, that we go forward in this Congress and deliberately appropriate a hundred million dollars less than are required to carry on the Government, and then go to the country and claim that we have reduced expenditures a hundred million dollars? If we should do so, we may deceive somebody else, but we shall not deceive ourselves. What is not appropriated by one Congress for the current ordinary expenditures of Government becomes a deficiency which the next Congress must provide for.

Why, what did the Fiftieth Congress do? not deliberately, I assume, but the fact illustrates the point I am making. The Fiftieth Congress at its second session did not appropriate enough for pensions by $25,321,907, but turned that deficiency over to the Fifty-first Congress; and now the gentleman from Missouri proposes to give the Fiftieth Congress credit for what it ought to have done but failed to do, and to charge the amount against the Fifty-first Congress, which did the work that the previous Congress ought to have done! Not only that, but the Fiftieth Congress left $13,295,541 deficiencies outside of pensions, making a total of deficiencies of over thirty-eight and a half millions. And now gentlemen claim that because the Fiftieth Congress did not appropriate thirty-eight and a half millions required for pensions and for the ordinary expenditures of Government for the fiscal year 1890, as it should have done, therefore it reduced expenditures! It did not do anything of the kind. It simply imposed upon the Fifty-first Congress the necessity of appropriating these thirty-eight and a half millions, which ought to have been appropriated by the Fiftieth Congress.

Footing up the appropriations, without reference to deficiencies, the Fiftieth Congress, on the basis of the tables submitted by the gentleman from Missouri, appropriated $817,000,000 and the Fifty-first Congress $988,000,000; and now gentlemen say: "Lo! behold the wicked work of the 'billion-dollar Congress' in appropriating $170,000,000 more than the Fiftieth Congress appropriated!"

Correcting the table presented by the gentleman from Missouri in accordance with the notes appended to it, the gross appropriations shown by it would be as follows:

Forty-seventh Congress, for 1883 and 1884	$889,501,432
Forty-eighth Congress, for 1885 and 1886	695,078,612
Forty-ninth Congress, for 1887 and 1888	752,039,160
Fiftieth Congress, for 1889 and 1890	837,017,925
Fifty-first Congress, 1891 and 1892	949,799,735

This change of footings is wrought simply by placing the deficiencies where they belong.

The Fifty-first Congress appropriated for pensions $10,000,000 more than will be expended during the current fiscal year; but the Fiftieth Congress appropriated $25,000,000 less for pensions than was required. Yet the gentlemen who did that go around and say, "Lo! behold how much we saved!" Obviously, gentlemen, the fact that twenty-five millions less was appropriated by the Fiftieth Congress for pensions than was required does not change the fact which every candid man understands, that this sum is chargeable not to the Fifty-first but to the Fiftieth Congress. No intelligent man is deceived by such a performance.

Now, foot up the appropriations as a candid man should do. Of the $988,417,183 appropriated by what you call the "billion-dollar Congress," $38,647,448 belonged to the previous Congress. That leaves $949,799,735. More than that, $10,000,000 too much was appropriated for pensions by the Fifty-first Congress. Deduct that, and you have $939,799,735. More than that; among the estimated permanent appropriations for 1892 there appears for the first time in the estimates $16,000,000 on account of the bank redemption fund, of which I have spoken. In the revised estimates for 1891 there also appears over twenty-three millions for this same purpose for 1891, which lifts the last estimates to that extent. Now, all through previous Congresses the bank redemption fund had not been counted in as a part of the estimated permanent appropriations, although the payments then were larger than now. Deduct $16,000,000 from the estimates of permanent appriations presented by the gentleman from Missouri, and you have as the amount of the actual appropriations of the last Congress $923,799,735, taking as a basis the tables submitted by the gentleman from Missouri, to which is to be added whatever deficiencies may be required and whatever amount the actual permanent and indefinite appropriations may exceed the estimates.

If the revised estimates for 1891 are to be used as the basis of permanent appropriations for that year, then over twenty-three millions of payments on account of bank redemption fund must be deducted from them.

Now, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TURNER] asks how much the deficiencies of the fiscal year ending June 30 next are likely to be. We have communications from the Treasury Department and the Superintendent of Census asking for the appropriation of deficiencies for the current fiscal year. We have already appropriated $200,000 for the Census, and probably $100,000 more will be added to that sum. The estimates for deficiencies, outside of the Census, submitted to Congress call for about $2,000,000. I am justified, therefore, in assuming that the deficiencies will not exceed two and a half millions, unless there may be some unusual requirements.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], in his first speech, assumed, I believe, that the actual expenditures under the head of permanent and indefinite appropriations, outside of deficiencies, would be $18,000,000 larger than stated in the estimates included in the clerks' tables which he submitted as the basis of his charges against what he calls "the billion-dollar Congress." If this be correct, then $20,500,000 should be added to $923,500,000, making nine hundred and forty-four millions as the total gross appropriations by the Fifty-first Congress for 1891 and 1892, including the sinking fund and postal expenditures paid by postal revenue; or, if the revised estimates be taken as a basis of the increase of permanent and indefinite appropriations, then about nine and a half millions more should be added, carrying up the total gross appropriations for these two years to $953,797,369, instead of over $1,000,000,000 as charged.

But it should be borne in mind that this sum is the gross appropriations, and not the appropriations involving a charge on the Treasury for annual expenditures. Included in this sum was $98,030,295 for the sinking fund for 1891 and 1892, which is simply a payment for reduction of the principal of the public debt, and $136,931,785 for postal expenses paid by postal revenue. Deducting these sums, and there remains as the net appropriations by the so-called "billion-dollar Congress," chargeable to the Treasury for annual expenditures, seven hundred and nine millions on the basis of the first estimates of permanent and indefinite appropriations by the gentleman from Missouri, or $718,835,289 on the basis of the revised estimates, which, I think, will be found to be considerably in excess of the actual expenditures as they will appear at the close of the fiscal year.

Taking even the highest figure of permanent appropriations and the fact stands out that the actual appropriations by the Fifty-first Congress chargeable to the Treasury for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1891 and 1892, is less than seven hundred and nineteen millions, instead of the billion which has been so recklessly charged to its account, against six hundred and seventeen millions for 1889 and 1890.

That this covers the whole is made apparent by the official statement of expenditures, including interest, which shows that for the fiscal year 1891 they were in round figures three hundred and fifty-five millions, and that for the present fiscal year they are estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury at three hundred and thirty-eight millions—making six hundred and ninety-three millions as the actual expenditures for the fiscal years 1891 and 1892, or about $350,000,000 for each year, including pensions, interest, and charges growing out of the war of the rebellion.

Evidently gentlemen on the other side, who have been making swelling speeches on the stump, denouncing the wicked extravagance of the "billion-dollar Congress" in imposing billion-dollar expenditures, will find it necessary, if they have any regard for the facts, to modify them by substituting "seven-hundred-million-dollar Congress" for the "billion-dollar Congress." It would, to be sure, make a difference of $300,000,000 between the fact and the campaign story, but the truth must sooner or later prevail.

Now, Mr. Chairman, how much were the appropriations for 1889 and 1890 for which it was the duty of the Fiftieth Congress to provide? The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY]—and he is imitated by all the gentlemen who have undertaken to maintain the "billion-dollar" charge—again ignores the notes appended to the table which he presents, and places the appropriations for these years at only $817,963,860. He ignores entirely the fact told by the notes of his own tables, that the Fiftieth Congress left a deficiency of $38,617,448, which the Fifty-first Congress was obliged to appropriate. Adding this deficiency, and deducting the deficiency for 1888, which the Fiftieth Congress was compelled to appropriate, and it is found (as the tables which I will append to my remarks will show) that the gross appropriations for the fiscal years 1889 and 1890, which it was the duty of the Fiftieth Congress to provide for, were $19,054,065 more than the gentleman stated, or $837,017,925, adopting the amounts given in his tables for permanent and indefinite appropriations. Adopting the revised estimates of permanent appropriations for those years, and deducting the sinking fund and postal appropriations paid by postal revenue, and the net appropriations for 1889 and 1890 are found to be $617,223,769, against $718,835,289 for 1891 and 1892.

This shows an increase in the appropriations of the Fifty-first Congress, chargeable to the Treasury for annual expenditures, of exactly $101,611,520, instead of $194,000,000. And that this is not far from what the actual result will be is shown by the fact that the increase of expenditures for 1891 and 1892 over 1889 and 1890 is estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury at about $113,000,000. But as there was an increase of $56,168,537 in the appropriations for pensions, the increase of net appropriations outside of pensions is only $45,442,983 for the fiscal years 1891 and 1892. Even the appropriations of the Fiftieth Congress increased over those of the Forty-ninth Congress in full equal proportion as to all ordinary expenditures, and where the increase of the Fifty-first over the Fiftieth is larger it is due to the fact that the expenditures were unusual, such as paying old obligations for the census, the new navy, carrying out treaties with Indians, etc.

I have here a table showing the increase of the regular appropriation bills of the Fiftieth Congress over the Forty-ninth, and the Fifty-first over the Fiftieth, which I will insert in my printed remarks. Here is the table:

Increase of regular annual appropriations.

*No increase. †Less.

You will observe that the bill in which the appropriations by the Fifty-first Congress are seemingly most increased is the postal bill—the increase being over $22,000,000.

I am reminded of this because the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] the other day commended this increase of appropriations for the postal service as a wise and proper thing, entirely consistent with the growth of a prosperous country.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. And he was correct in that statement.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, he was correct in so stating.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not wish to take anything back, but I wish to be understood correctly.

Mr. DINGLEY. I knew the gentleman would stand by what he stated.

Mr. BLOUNT. Of course; but I do not think the gentleman understood it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope the gentleman is not going to give a construction that would practically take back what he said the other day.

Mr. BLOUNT. Not at all; but the gentleman evidently did not understand me. I showed how by reason of the increased mileage and the increase of the pay of mail transportation as fixed by law, the same during these several periods, the increase of necessity arose.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, my friend from Georgia knows that the appropriations for the postal service for the two fiscal years 1891 and 1892 were $22,000,000 more than the appropriations for the two fiscal years covered by the Fiftieth Congress, 1889 and 1890, and that increase he concedes was necessary and proper.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes.

Mr. DINGLEY. And every dollar of it was paid, not by taxation, but from the revenues arising from the postal service itself.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not recollect exactly the figures, but I agree with the gentleman, so far as the postal service is concerned, that it largely takes care of itself.

Mr. DINGLEY. Precisely; and yet this twenty-two million increase of appropriations for postal service is counted as a large part of the "extravagant appropriations" of the so-called "billion-dollar Congress!"

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. But not by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. DINGLEY. No; not by the gentleman from Georgia.

Now, this goes to show how misleading any statement of aggregate appropriations may be without a full understanding of the facts. The figures on the face of them show an increase of over $22,000,000 by the "billion-dollar Congress" for the postal service, and we have had the swelling tide of talk all over the country about the vicious and wanton extravagance of that Congress. Yet, as a matter of fact, while the figures show that the increase of appropriations for the postal service was over $22,000,000, yet the actual amount to be paid from the Treasury for 1891 and 1892 is four millions less than for 1889 and 1890. And why? Because all this increase of appropriations for postal service was paid for by postal revenue.

The apparent increase is only the method of bookkeeping in the Department, but it helps gentlemen who do not want to be candid to create the impression that appropriations by the other party are swelling extravagantly. Indeed, it was not till 1890 that so much of the postal expenditures as is paid by postal revenue was included in the statement of current expenditures. There is charged up, for example, in the last fiscal year over $77,000,000 postal appropriations and in the year preceding over $72,000,000. Now, these sums make about $150,000,000, which appear here as being expenditures that the people are called on to pay by taxation for the support of the postal service. But is that a fact? How much do you really suppose it required Congress to appropriate outside of the actual amounts derived from the postal service itself? One hundred and fifty millions of dollars? Oh, no; nothing like it; only about $14,000,000 for the two years; that was all. Now, by bookkeeping you charge to the appropriations of a wicked Congress $150,000,000, whereas, as a matter of fact, only $14,000,000 have been appropriated to be paid from the Treasury. It is only a difference of $136,000,000, it is true, but it helps to swell "the billion-dollar" speeches.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that every gentleman ought to preserve a reasonable degree of candor when discussing a matter like this. As I have already said, the increase of appropriations by the Fiftieth over the Forty-ninth Congress, chargeable to the Treasury, outside of pensions, for ordinary annual expenditures, was very nearly as much as the increase of the Fifty-first over the Fiftieth; and nobody ever charged the Democratic Fiftieth Congress as extravagant. Our friends on the other side were making a party issue on a principle then.

Mr. SAYERS. Will you allow an interruption?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. I believe the gentleman stated that both the Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Congresses were Democratic?

Mr. DINGLEY. I think I did.

Mr. SAYERS. That can not be so, for the Democrats did not have the Senate.

Mr. DINGLEY. I was referring, of course, to the House, which initiates appropriation bills.

Mr. SAYERS. Very well; and it will be found by examination that every single appropriation bill after it passed the House was increased by the Republican Senate.

Mr. REED. And do you remember that Senator Beck supported the increases? You remember that vigorous speech in which he lashed the Democracy?

Mr. SAYERS. I am not talking of speeches now. I am talking of the fact. I am calling the attention of the House to the fact that these increases were made by the Senate. But I am glad to see that the gentleman is getting aroused.

Mr. DINGLEY. My friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], is one of the fairest-minded men on that side of the House, and I respect him exceedingly, and he knows that when the House was Democratic and the Senate was Republican—and I do not know but it would be the same if the situation was reversed—we have seen the by-play of trying to escape responsibility for what the gentlemen controlling the House knew had got to be done by carefully appropriating here some millions of dollars less than they actually knew would be required, and giving as an excuse that the Senate would put it on.

Mr. SAYERS. That is merely your opinion. That is not the fact, but your opinion.

Mr. WALKER. And then they go over to the Senate and put it in.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have seen this performance too many times, and it would not surprise me if I were to see the same thing again. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that in my judgment all this business is unworthy of statesmen to whom is committed the trust of caring for a great Government like this. I do not know when I have been more encouraged, and have felt more encouraged that we were indeed about to rise to the height of the occasion, than when I heard the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] the other day, in response to a suggestion of wicked extravagance in postal expenditures, promptly respond, with the spirit of common sense and patriotism, that the expenditures have grown no more than the country has grown.

Mr. BOUTELLE. That was his former speech.

Mr. DINGLEY. That was worthy of the gentleman.

But, Mr. Chairman, I had begun to read a comparative statement of increase of appropriations. I will not take the time to read it in full. It is surprising, while they run on different items, how uniform the increases are. The increase of the Fiftieth over the Forty-ninth was $1,708,335 in the agricultural appropriation. The increase of the Fifty-first over the Fiftieth was $1,441,473; simply showing that neither increase was extravagant, but that it was merely following the growth of the country and of the interests of agriculture. Only half of the District of Columbia appropriations are paid by the United States.

Now, where did the great increase outside of the postal service come? It so happened that in the Fiftieth Congress there was but very little increase of appropriations for the Navy, because the new vessels had not been advanced sufficiently. It was in the Fifty-first Congress that there began to come upon us large bills for the new vessels that had been properly authorized by preceding Democratic Houses. Of course we did not pay for them or largely appropriate until they were in process of construction. We appropriated in the Fifty-first Congress $14,000,000 more for the Navy than the Fiftieth Congress did. It was not extravagance; it simply happened that the vessels came along so that we had to pay for them at that time. The vessels were not authorized by the Fifty-first Congress, they were authorized by preceding Congresses; and we simply followed, as every Congress will have to do, the practice of paying the bills as they mature, no matter who may have authorized them. Why, my friends, I do not charge upon the Democratic House of the Fiftieth Congress extravagance. And yet there was as much occasion to charge extravagance upon the Fiftieth Congress as the Fifty-first.

I think there was little in either. In some minor items there may always be extravagance; but in the main the House of that Congress was composed of as earnest, as honorable, and as statesmanlike men as any Congress that has assembled here. And so was the last Congress. I am aware that for partisan reasons its work was assaulted all along the line and misrepresented; but time will set all matters right. What our increases of appropriations outside of Navy were for may be stated in a nutshell. First there was $2,802,000 for fortifications. We had adopted the policy of preparing our coast for defense as a preparation for possible war and the best preventive of war. Was that wrong? Was that wicked? Was that extravagant? No one will pretend that it was. The fortification bill was passed by a substantially unanimous vote of this House.

There was an increase of $7,307,000 to carry out our treaties with the Indians. Part of this was necessitated by the ratification of certain treaties by which large quantities of the public lands were turned over to the nation. And while it appears now as an expenditure, most of it will be repaid by and by, by the sale of the public lands.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Repaid and more too.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, it will be repaid and more too, as suggested by the gentleman from Iowa. Yet that is one of the items about which some gentlemen, who have certain ends which I can not approve of in view, go around in chorus throughout the country and charge that the Fifty-first Congress was wickedly extravagant.

The increase of nearly three millions in the river and harbor bill, and over five millions including the Mississippi River appropriations in the sundry civil bill, were pressed and almost unanimously supported by our Democratic friends.

The only appropriations of the Fifty-first Congress which were opposed on the Democratic side were those to encourage the cultivation of sugar, to encourage the establishment of American steamship lines, and to refund the direct tax—and the latter received the support of even my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], and would have been passed by the Fiftieth Congress had not filibustering prevented the majority from carrying out their wishes. As I have already said, the item of increase which most swelled the appropriations was that for pensions, caused largely by the disability pension bill. Let gentlemen who denounce the "billion-dollar" Congress for its wicked extravagance be frank, and distinctly say that what they complain of is the expenditure caused by the bill which pensions disabled soldiers in such straits that they are in danger of becoming, or already are, objects of charity.

Some of the increases appearing under the head of permanent appropriations—notably, over ten millions for repayments to importers for deposits and for drawbacks in excess of those made in 1889 and 1890—are not actual expenditures, but simply appear so because of the system of bookkeeping. Others, like the $14,258,497 for refunding of direct tax, and $1,120,082 rebate on tobacco tax, are in no sense current expenditures, but a just return of taxes paid into the Treasury. The $7,000,000 increase in appropriations for census is an inevitable additional expenditure, to be provided for by the Congress that exists in the census years. The $1,085,240 appropriated for judgments rendered by the Court of Claims in favor of the heirs of the French spoliation sufferers, is simply the payment of a long-deferred debt. In fact, nearly all the increase of appropriations by the Fifty-first Congress over the Fiftieth, outside of pensions, arises from unusual causes in no manner having reference to ordinary expenditures, and are due to the increase of the Navy, refunding of the district tax, payment of French spoliation claims, the census, and the bounty on sugar.

Mr. Chairman, I was very much amused awhile ago by the discussion as to whether there should be an appropriation for a new gas plant for the Military Academy. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] in charge of the bill stated there was great necessity for the improvement of that plant, and that it would cost $50,000 to do it. Gentlemen began to declaim against such extravagance, and really I thought that some of them were about to ask whether we could not go back to tallow dips and reduce expenditures in that way. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Why, Mr. Chairman, this is indeed a great country, and the people of this country are not in favor of such a picayune method of dealing with the public expenditures as will lose money rather than save it.

There is a wise economy and an unwise economy. When the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] told the committee that by expending $50,000 on the gas plant at the Military Academy we would save from ten to twelve thousand dollars a year in our gas bills, it struck me that demonstrated that it was a measure of economy; and I supposed every gentleman would say, "Let us do it, for it gives us an interest of 20 per cent on our investment." But I soon discovered that gentleman were looking at something else than the public interest. They were looking at capital for an approaching election. They were thinking of what they could say upon the platform, and they were willing to damage the interests of this great nation if they could say that $50,000 had been apparently saved by withholding an appropriation, while we were losing $10,000 a year by refusing to give a public institution the best and most economical appliances.

Now, that is not economy, gentlemen. That is not the broad spirit with which this House should approach such a question as this. Gentlemen should approach it, not with a view of seeing how little they can spend without regard to the results, but when they do appropriate a dollar they should see that it is appropriated in such a way as to best promote the public service. If the House will do that, money expended wisely by way of taxation is as profitable an investment as any the American people can make.

Mr. Chairman, suppose in your municipalities and townships, where it is proposed to expend $5,000 or more to build a highway, some one rises up and poses as an economist and says, "No; our people are poor. We can not afford good roads. Let us continue traveling over the corduroy roads that formerly existed." A citizen who had a particle of breadth of mind and foresight would reply, "Why, gentlemen, by expending $5,000 for this road we will so reduce the cost of transportation that our people at the end of each year, instead of being poorer, will be richer than ever before." The question should be whether or not the money is to be wisely expended for the public good, and not how much you can cut the figures down, by taking off this and that without regard to the benefits to be obtained by the expenditure. Let us act from broader and higher motives than these.

Gentlemen, a great deal has been said about the growth of the expenses of this country. They have grown. They have grown, first, because the country has increased rapidly in population; they have grown, secondly, because the business of the country has increased more rapidly than the population; they have grown because the Government has been doing more and more from year to year to increase the comfort and opportunities of our people; and they have grown more since 1861 because of the war of the rebellion, which we all so much regret.

Why, Mr. Chairman, I have here, culled from the expenditures of the last fiscal year, a statement of those that arose from the war of the rebellion. It is twenty-six years since the war closed, and yet last year we expended, aside from the reduction of the principal of the public debt, $184,000,000 for purposes that never would have existed if it had not been for the war of the rebellion. While the whole expenditures last year amounted to $355,000,000, or $5.45 per inhabitant, nearly $3 of that $5.45 was for purposes that grew out of the war of the rebellion. Here is the statement:

Expenditures in fiscal year 1891 for objects rendered necessary by the war of the rebellion.

For pensions and Pension Office	$129,475,963
For interest on war debt	38,030,108
For bounties	575,368
For national cemeteries	235,566
For artificial limbs and appliances	532,359
For maps of battlefield and Chickamauga Park	23,246
For publication Records of the War of the Rebellion	199,560
For national soldiers' homes	2,838,638
For support of national soldiers' homes and interest account	516,954
For refund to certain States expenses of volunteers	62,500
For horses and other property lost in service	79,306
For commutation of rations to prisoners of war	51,064
For stores and supplies taken by Army	75,481
Refund of direct tax	11,521,497
	184,217,621

Or nearly $3 per inhabitant.

There are other minor items, not included in the above, to be added that will make our expenditures on account of the war of the rebellion last year full $3 per inhabitant. That is, while the expenditures of the Government for 1891 and 1892, under what gentlemen on the other side call "the billion-dollar Congress," are about seven hundred millions, at least three hundred and seventy millions of this sum are necessitated by expenditures forced upon the country by secession.

Now, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON] the other day in debate said, that in 1859 our expenses were about $2 per inhabitant, but that now, under Republican rule, they are $6 per inhabitant. The exact per capita expenditure last year was $5.45 per inhabitant. Let my friend bear in mind, and tell his Georgia constituents when he returns home, that of this $5.45, $3 came from the war of the rebellion, leaving about $2.45 per inhabitant for all other purposes. Well, now, how small an increase—45 cents per inhabitant—is this, when you come to get at the facts?

Now, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that when we come to realize that this Government has inevitably in the growth of population, business, and civilization broadened out and become a mighty power, we must see that necessarily this growth has caused an increase of expenditures, and wisely, too. We expend a million dollars in the Life-Saving Service. We did not do that before the war. We did not spend anything then, but left the poor sailors wrecked upon the coast to their own fate, and took no steps for the preservation of their lives. We spend a million dollars for that purpose now. We spend millions for other public objects, such as agricultural experiment stations, colleges of agriculture, improvement of rivers and harbors, light-houses, etc. Is it wrong? I believe that is in accordance with the civilization of the age and the highest practical wisdom, and when gentlemen talk about going back they forget that we have all grown. The nation has grown, our business has grown, our industries have grown, our store of learning has grown, and we have become a great nation and a people whose equal in all respects is not to be found on the face of the earth.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in approaching the subject of appropriations—for this Military Academy bill is the first general appropriation bill—it seems to me that we ought to approach it as statesmen and patriots, and not with any low hustings motives. We are charged with the best interests of the nation, and if we do not fulfill our trusts, appropriating wisely where appropriation will be wise, I am sure that history will record that we have been faithless to the responsibilities put upon us. Let us rise to the height of the occasion. Wherever there is a dollar improperly spent let it be cut off; but wherever there is an important public object to be furthered like that to which the bill which is now pending applies, the work of appropriately providing for our great Military Academy—the Military Academy which has been the nursery of so many heroes in the past, and to which we must look in the future whenever peril threatens us—whenever, I say, any meritorious public object is to be advanced, let us do our duty.

Let us be statesmen in this matter and cease this bickering as to whether this Congress or that Congress has spent a dollar more or a dollar less than some other. There must necessarily be variations in appropriations from year to year. I take it that one side of this House is as desirous of avoiding improper appropriations as the other side. It is not a partisan question. Let us strip it of partisanship and approach this subject in the spirit in which it should be considered; for I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that if we do so we shall cease such unprofitable criticism as has already been made on this and that item, and shall be willing to vote a reasonable sum for the protection and the promotion of the interests of this nation, the greatest nation upon the face of the earth, a nation that, in the lifetime of some gentlemen now on this floor, is to number a population of more than one hundred millions of people; a nation that stands for all that is noble, for all that relates to the advancement of human liberty; a nation that is the hope of the world. [Prolonged applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words upon the merits of this bill, but I desire more to proceed to the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule, and probably I shall then have an opportunity of submitting what I wish to state. I therefore ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed at this time, and that the committee proceed to consider the bill by paragraphs under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] asks unanimous consent that general debate be now closed. Is there objection?

Mr. WALKER. I certainly object, and I hope there will be more opportunity given for general debate on the bill itself.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There will be an opportunity under the five-minute rule.

Mr. WALKER. But I shall speak more than five minutes on this bill.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Well, I will see that the gentleman has a reasonable time.

Mr. WALKER. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I have the floor, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] for unanimous consent that general debate now close.

Mr. WALKER. I object.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise, for the purpose of limiting general debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and, the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCCREARY, from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that they had had under consideration the Military Academy bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its secretaries, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 2056) to repeal the provisions of an act entitled "An act to amend sections 4488 and 4489 of the Revised Statutes, requiring life-saving appliances on steamers," approved March 2, 1889, so far as they relate to steamers plying exclusively upon any of the lakes, bays, or sounds of the United States; in which concurrence was requested.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill No. 4636, making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893, and for other purposes; and, pending that, I move that general debate thereon be limited to thirty minutes.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will allow more time for general debate, and that we shall have it in the morning.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There have been three hours allowed for general debate, and only about one-third of that time has been devoted to this bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN of New Jersey. That is a large proportion. [Laughter.]

The motion of Mr. OUTHWAITE, limiting general debate to thirty minutes, was then agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill indicated by him.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, pending that, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

Mr. FAULKNER. I present a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah to the Senate and House of Representatives. As I understand that it is usual for memorials from Legislatures to be printed in the RECORD, I ask that this memorial be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Utah, respectfully represent:

Utah contains an aggregate wealth of more than $200,000,000. The proceeds of her farms, live stock, mines, and manufactures for the year 1890 amounted to $23,000,000.

She has near a quarter of a million of civilized people who, in point of intelligence, industry, and all the essential qualities of good citizenship, are up to the standard of any American community. Polygamy, once practiced by a small portion of her people, has yielded to the supremacy of the law by a sense of the evils flowing from it and of the utter futility of further attempting to maintain an institution obnoxious to general public sentiment.

In the midst of wonderful material progress her people have recently turned their attention to the study of questions of government and legitimate politics and are espousing the cause of one or the other of the national parties.

These new conditions have come naturally and honestly, and for the future are absolutely secure. A patriotic people are pledged to their preservation. Retrogression, involving, as it would, dishonor and dire misfortune, is impossible.

Utah, in the feelings of her people, has been lifted from her humiliation and disgrace. To-day she is imbued with the hope and determination to be free—free in the full sense of American constitutional freedom, which means something more than liberty-permitted; which consists in civil and political rights absolutely guarantied, assured, and guarded; in one's liberties as a man and a citizen, his right to vote, his right to hold office, his equality with all others who are his fellow-citizens—all these guarded and protected and not held at the mercy and discretion of one man or popular majority or distant body unadvised as to local needs or interests.

Be it known how little of such freedom Utah and her people possess.

The governor, the secretary, the members of the judiciary, except justices of the peace, the marshal, the public prosecutor and his assistants, the board of commissioners, who appoint all registration and election officers, and control the elections, are elected by a distant appointing power, and are utterly unaccountable to the people for the manner in which they perform the duties of their offices.

The governor nominates the auditor of public accounts, the treasurer, the governing boards of all public institutions, such as the university, agricultural college, reform school, and insane asylum. Thus the people have no voice in the selection of persons to manage the public funds and institutions created and maintained at their expense.

The Territorial school commissioner is selected by the supreme court, and owes no responsibility to the people.

Clerks selected by the district judges and the probate judges appointed by the President, by and with the advice of the Senate, select the regular panels for jurors. The regular panel is supplemented by persons summoned at the discretion of the United States marshal. The determination of rights of life, liberty, and property rests with tribunals, no part of which owe any accountability to those most vitally concerned in the faithful performance of their duties. The marshal and his deputies are clothed with the most far-reaching authority, under which they may usurp the functions of all the local constabulary and police of the Territory. Even the justices of the peace are shorn of their limited jurisdiction by commissioners appointed by the supreme court, and whose jurisdiction is made coextensive with that of such justices.

The will of the representatives of the people in the enactment of needed legislation is liable to be defeated at the caprice of a gubernatorial autocrat clothed with the power of absolute veto.

While county prosecuting attorneys elected by the people are permitted to initiate prosecutions in the inferior courts, no such prosecution can be carried forward to success except according to the pleasure of the district attorney imposed upon our people from abroad. The most vicious interference with the vestige remaining of our local liberties is in the maintenance and action of the Utah Commission, who, in their appointment of registration officers, have often selected corrupt and irresponsible persons. These have filled the registration lists with fictitious names and resorted to other devices by which repeating and other frauds might be successfully perpetrated at elections.

There is no province or dependency, it is believed, of any civilized nation wherein the people are not accorded more of liberty and the rights of man than are possessed by American citizens in Utah. The situation is intolerable to freemen. The people, through us, their chosen but helpless representatives, demand relief. The officeholders, their patrons, those who fatten upon the degradation and misfortune of our people, all the hordes of beneficiaries of the present system will resist the appeal.

Your memorialists, however, confidently relying upon the justice of the representatives of the American people, ask the Congress of the United States to enact into a law, as a measure which will afford immediate relief, the bill introduced in the Senate by Senator FAULKNER, and in the House of Representatives by Delegate CAINE, "for the local government of Utah Territory, and to provide for the election of certain officers in said Territory."

Your memorialists further ask that as all essential conditions exist entitling Utah to admission into the Union as a State, and that as soon as your honorable body is satisfied of this fact, a law may at once be enacted permitting her to take the position for which she is so eminently fitted.

And your memorialists will ever pray.

WILLIAM H. SEEGMILLER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
WILLIAM H. KING,
President of the Council.

Mr. FELTON. I present a petition of citizens of California, in which they say:

The undersigned citizens of the United States of America, residing on the Pacific coast, respectfully and urgently petition Congress to provide or guarantee such necessary means as will assist, protect, and hasten the completion and secure the national control of the Nicaragua Maritime Canal, as recommended to Congress by the President of the United States in his annual message.

In this connection I wish to say that the gentlemen who signed this petition were all aware what they were doing. They realize the fact that the building of that great water way would shorten the transportation between the east and west coasts of America some 7,000 miles, and would bring us by the width of a great ocean nearer in connection with our foreign commerce south from our east and west coast; that it would be nature's great highway, free to all of small and great means, that it could not be controlled or monopolized by combinations concentrating receipts of transportation into a few hands, but would be a factor to distribute the profits of production among the producers and consumers.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEWART. I present a petition of citizens of the State of Nevada, praying for the passage of a law ceding, in trust, to the States and Territories of the arid region, respectively, the unsold public lands within their borders for the purpose of reclaiming the same.

The petition is very numerously signed by prominent citizens of Nevada residing in many localities in the State. I should like to remark, with regard to the matter, that I have no doubt the local Legislatures are very much better advised than Congress can be as to the peculiar condition of the arid lands, and if the public lands should be ceded to the States and Territories for that purpose it would undoubtedly be a great good, provided that such limitations be made as would secure the absolute use of the lands to permanent settlers. I have found great difficulty in framing a bill satisfactory to myself on this subject, although there is a strong demand throughout the arid region for the donation of this land for this purpose, and it is a grand purpose.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, not intending to infringe upon the jurisdiction of the Committee on Public Lands, but for the purpose of calling the attention of that committee to the subject, and having them discuss the propriety of such a measure. I suppose if such a bill is reported it will probably come from the Committee on Public Lands, but the Committee on Irrigation might look over the matter, and if they have any recommendations to make they might submit them to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to ask the Senator what the provisions of the bill are.

Mr. STEWART. There is no bill; it is merely a petition. I have not been able to frame a satisfactory bill.

Mr. DOLPH. For what does the petition pray?

Mr. STEWART. It prays Congress to cede the arid lands to the States and Territories for the purpose of irrigation.

Mr. DOLPH. I have been quite willing to concede, so far as I am concerned and so far as I am entitled to act for the Committee on Public Lands, the jurisdiction over bills proposing to provide a method for the irrigation of desert lands or to aid in the reclamation of desert lands to the Committee on Irrigation. I myself introduced a bill early in the session which I had referred to that committee, but I also introduced a bill proposing to make changes in the existing law and superseding all existing enactments for the disposition of the desert lands, and I shall be inclined to contend, unless instructed otherwise by the Committee on Public Lands, for jurisdiction over any provision looking to the disposition of the public lands; that is, the sale or disposal of them by the United States. I mention this so that the Senator may understand how far I think the Committee on Public Lands should retain jurisdiction.

Mr. STEWART. My object in asking to have the petition referred to the Committee on Irrigation is simply to have the opinion and investigation of that committee for the Senate in discussion; and probably if the committee has any recommendation to submit we shall report it back and refer it to the Committee on Public Lands, if it is thought that any action should be taken at this session with regard to ceding public lands to the States and Territories. For that purpose I have moved that the petition be referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator is a member of that committee?

Mr. STEWART. I am.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator seems to speak with some doubt about any action being taken at the present Congress on the subject. I suggest to him that if any legislation which is to prove at all valuable in the matter is enacted, it should be enacted at once. If a bill had been prepared some years ago for ascertaining private rights due individuals it would have been comparatively easy now to enact legislation on this subject. It will now encounter great difficulty.

Mr. STEWART. I will inquire of the Senator what disposition was made of the resolutions that were passed at the Salt Lake convention?

Mr. DOLPH. The memorial went to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STEWART. Then I will allow this petition to go with it.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Nevada that somewhere along the line it might be well enough to have this matter go to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, for that committee to investigate as to the agricultural aspects of the particular questions involved. Perhaps it might be well for the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands to determine first whether the lands to be dealt with are arid; then the matter might go to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to determine what kind of irrigation would be best to develop them agriculturally, and then it might be referred to the Committee on Public Lands for them to determine whether these particular lands should be thus segregated from the great body of the public lands and turned over to the States and Territories in which they may happen to be located for their use and benefit as proposed.

Mr. STEWART. I think it is well to let the petition go to the Committee on Public Lands in the first instance, because they have jurisdiction to dispose of these lands.

Mr. PADDOCK. Oh, it is all right. I accept the Senator's apology.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. TELLER presented a petition of the board of county commissioners of Arapahoe County, Colo., praying for the passage of a bill to provide for the establishment of a coinage mint at Denver, Colo.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. VEST presented the petition of George S. Hillhouse and other citizens of Lawrence County, Mo., praying for the free coinage of silver; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SQUIRE. I present resolutions adopted by the Tacoma (Wash.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring the equitable adjustment of the salaries of the local inspectors of hulls and boilers for the Puget Sound district. The sense of justice of the petitioners in this behalf will be met by adopting the provisions of Senate bill 1629, of the Fifty-first Congress, known as the "Frye shipping bill." I present similar resolutions adopted by the Seattle (Wash.) Chamber of Commerce. I move that the resolutions lie on the table to accompany the bill, which I understand has been again reported.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 136) for the presentation of badges to the officers and men of the Greely relief expedition, to report it favorably with amendments, and I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I think the bill ought to go on the Calendar.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have no objection, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PASCO, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1391) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the account stated between the General Government and the State of Florida by the said Secretary, under the authority of the act approved March 2, 1889, known as the deficiency appropriation act, and to pay the balance found to be due said State, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1911) to remove the disability of those who, having participated in the rebellion, have since its termination enlisted in the United States Navy and become disabled in the line of duty, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 2137) to amend an act entitled "An act amending the pension law so as to remove the disability of those who, having participated in the Rebellion, have since its termination enlisted in the Army of the United States, and become disabled," approved March 3, 1877; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same Committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1907) to amend section 3 of the act approved June 27, 1890, granting pensions to soldiers and sailors, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report therein.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 261) for the relief of the legal representatives and devisees of James W. Schaumburg, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CAREY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 126) to authorize the trustees of Trinity Church, Hot Springs, Ark., to purchase certain lots, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BOARD OF GEOGRAPHIC NAMES.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 10,000 extra copies of the report of the United States Board on Geographic Names, transmitted to Congress by the President on December 23, 1891; 1,000 copies of which shall be for the use of the Senate; 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 7,000 copies for distribution by said Board among the Government Departments, public libraries, and other suitable depositories.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. VANCE introduced a bill (S. 2138) for the relief of John Webster, of Washington City, D. C.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 2139) for the relief of Agnes and Marie De Leon; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PEFFER introduced a bill (S. 2140) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to convey to the State of Kansas certain lands therein for homes for old soldiers and their families; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DOLPH. I think it should go to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PEFFER. It refers to a cession of a reservation, or, rather, the granting of the use of the military reservation of Fort Hays. I thought on that account perhaps the bill ought to go to the Military Committee.

Mr. DOLPH. All bills for disposing of abandoned military reservations have gone to the Committee on Public Lands, without any exception whatever.

Mr. PEFFER. Very well; if the Senator from Oregon thinks the bill should be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, let it go to that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CHANDLER introduced a bill (S. 2141) granting a pension to Elizabeth H. Lord; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 2142) for the relief of M. S. Hellman, of Canyon City, Oregon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills, this day received from the House of Representatives, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill (H. R. 497) to determine the sessions of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Wisconsin; and

A bill (H. R. 3927) to amend "An act to provide for the performance of the duties of the office of President in the case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice-President," approved January 19, 1886.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. WASHBURN. I ask for the adoption of the following order:

Ordered, That all papers relating to Senate bill No. 1184, "For the relief of the heirs of Joseph Anderson," be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The order will be agreed to, subject to the rule.

Mr. HARRIS. There is a standing rule which requires the file clerk to send to the appropriate committees all business on file when bills have been introduced and referred to the committees, and such special orders are wholly unnecessary.

HON. R. H. M. DAVIDSON.

Mr. VANCE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate the sum of $1,258 to Hon. R. H. M. Davidson for expenses in prosecuting his claim to a seat in the Senate under the appointment of the governor of Florida.

STENOGRAPHER FOR WOMAN SUFFRAGE COMMITTEE.

Mr. VANCE submitted the following resolutions; which were referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage have authority for the employment of a stenographer to report the hearings of February 24, 1890, and January 20, 1892, before that committee, of representatives of sundry State woman suffrage associations; and that the expense of such employment be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Resolved, That the recent hearings before the Committee on Woman Suffrage be printed with the report of said committee.

MADRID COLUMBIAN HISTORICAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a bill on the Calendar, Senate bill 1971, that ought to be acted upon promptly if at all. It is in regard to the Columbian Historical Exposition to be held in Madrid. I ask the consent of the Senate to take it up now. I think there will be no objection to it. It was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1971) providing for the appointment of representatives from the United States to the Columbian Historical Exposition at Madrid in 1892.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill was reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations with an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 4, the committee report to strike out the word "three" and to insert "a commissioner-general and two assistant:" so as to read:

That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and requested to appoint a commissioner-general and two assistant commissioners.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON MARKET COMPANY.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer a resolution, and before having it read I wish to say that I am not at all informed about the subject-matter to which the resolution relates. It was presented to me by citizens of Washington who feel that they have a grievance, and I introduce the resolution because I am obedient to the right of every citizen of the United States to petition this body for redress. After the resolution has been read I will ask its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby directed to inform the Senate under what authority and under what appropriation B street, between Seventh and Ninth streets NW., in front of the Center Market, has been paved 20 feet out from the footwalk on each side, while the rest of the carriageway is left as heretofore. Also under what authority of law the Washington Market Company has been allowed to obstruct the footwalks of said B street, in front of said market house, by the erection of an elevator, a stairway, and an eating house thereon, and the width of said footwalks and the number of feet said obstructions are extended out from the building line, with the amount of rental received per month by said market company for said eating house.

Also, under what law the said market company is allowed to space off and rent out the foot walks on B and Ninth streets, around the Center Market to farmers and others, and what is the total amount received annually by said market company for rental of said spaces, and what disposition is made of the money.

Also, if the corporation attorney for the District of Columbia, or his assistant, has given an opinion adverse to the right of said market company to jurisdiction over the foot walks outside of its walls, or to collect rents for the use thereof; and, if so, what action, if any, has been taken upon said opinion.

Also, the amount of franchise rental paid to the District of Columbia by said market company for the year ending June 30, 1891, whether said franchise rental has been reduced, which was fixed in amount and set aside by act of Congress for the benefit of the poor of Washington; and, if so, how much, and for what reason or reasons.

Also, that said Commissioners furnish a statement showing the assessed value of the land and improvements of the Washington Market Company under the assessment recently made.

And also, a statement of the rental paid said market company for the District Militia armory during the year ending June 30, 1891, and the amount paid said market company by farmers and others for the use of foot walks covering the same period, stated separately, with the total of said amounts, and whether they do not amount to more than the franchise rental received from said company for the benefit of the poor during the same period.

Also, under what law or permit the Washington Market Company has been granted permission to erect a bridge leading from Pennsylvania avenue on the line of Eighth street to said market, with the number of square feet of land occupied by said bridge, its market value, and what rental is paid for the use of the same, and if said bridge was not erected for the purpose of giving access to certain rooms over said market building, to enable said market company to rent said upper rooms to the District government for an armory, and if the amount of rental paid for said upper rooms does not amount to more than the entire rental paid for all the other District buildings that are used for executive or clerical purposes.

Also, a statement showing under what law said market company is allowed to hold possession of the two squares of ground bounded by Tenth and Twelfth streets, B street and Ohio and Louisiana avenues, given by act of Congress to the city of Washington for a wholesale market; the present assessed value of said squares; what rental said market company receives for them, and what proportion of said rentals, if any, is paid over to the District of Columbia; and why farmers are not required to sell their produce on said squares as required by act of Congress approved May 20, 1870, instead of selling said produce on the public streets, in violation of law, and to the great obstruction thereof.

Also, the date of the establishment of a cold storage and ice plant by said market company, and the extra quantity of water used in consequence thereof, with the date that water meters were put on to measure water used by said company, and if there was any increase in the water rents charged against said company in consequence of the extra water used by said plants up to the time meters were put on, and if there was no increase in said water rents the reasons why said market company has not been required to pay its just proportion of water rents as private citizens are required to pay.

Also, if said market company is in arrears for special assessment or other taxes, and if so, to what amount, how long such taxes have been due, and why they have not been collected.

NICARAGUA CANAL COMPANY.

Mr. HIGGINS. I offer a resolution and ask that it lie on the table and be printed.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, instructed to obtain and transmit to the Senate, at the earliest convenient day, a detailed statement, properly certified by the chief engineer of the Nicaragua Canal Company, of the amount and kind of work done, and of the materials, tools, and supplies furnished upon the said canal, and the cash cost of the same.

Also a detailed statement, properly certified by the appropriate officer of the canal company, of all contracts and obligations now in existence between the said canal company and all other governments, persons, or companies, and the actual cash received and expended by it, and for what purposes; the amount of cash paid in upon subscriptions to its stock and bonds; the amount of cash now on hand available for the prosecution of its work; the amount of bonds and stock issued, to whom and for what purposes; the amount subscribed; for and by whom, and upon what terms, together with a complete balance sheet showing the said company's resources, assets, and liabilities of every name and nature, all as of January 1, 1892.

Also a detailed statement showing the capital and organization of any contracting or constructing company with whom the said canal company may have entered into a contract or contracts for constructing any part of its canal, or furnishing any labor, services, machinery, materials, or supplies, for the said canal, and setting forth the amount of stock and bonds issued by the said contracting company, to whom and under what terms, the amount of cash received by the said contracting company from all sources, the amounts paid out, and to whom and for what purposes; the amount of stock or bonds subscribed for, and by whom and upon what terms; the amount of cash on hand available for carrying out its contracts with the said canal company and others; the amount and cash value of its assets of every kind, and, finally, a complete balance sheet as of January 1, 1892, showing the said contract company's assets, resources, and liabilities, of every name and nature.

The Secretary of the Interior is also requested to furnish copies of all contracts made and entered into by either of the companies hereinbefore described, together with any other information he may have or can obtain in reference to the operations or responsibility of either of the said companies.

Mr. MORGAN. Before the resolution is acted on, I wish to say that I am very glad indeed to find the Senate is drawing closer and closer to this question and undertaking to exercise a stronger jurisdiction over it than has heretofore been supposed to be within its reach. I think, however, the Senator from Delaware will find that a portion of the resolution requires duties to be performed by the Secretary of the Interior which are not provided for by law. The Secretary of the Interior has the right, doubtless, to catechise the Maritime Canal Company in respect to all the matters that are alluded to in the resolution, but another company is mentioned here, a construction company, with which Congress has had heretofore nothing to do, which has no right to rely upon Congress at all, and which the Committee on Foreign Relations have heretofore ignored so far as its legal relations were concerned, but have inquired diligently into its operations because it was one of the instrumentalities employed for the purpose of building this canal.

At the proper time I shall ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, stating, however, that the Senate has already passed a resolution on this subject which the committee supposed to confer upon them quite as ample power as is attempted to be imposed upon the Secretary of the Interior by this resolution. The committee, having authority to send for persons and papers, can make a perfect investigation of this matter by witnesses under oath, whereas the Secretary of the Interior would have no authority under the law to require persons to appear with papers and to submit to investigation under oath who are not officers of or connected with the Maritime Canal Company. The resolution contemplates an examination of the operations of two companies with one of which Congress has had nothing to do in any official sense.

I merely wished to make that explanation, and to say to the Senator from Delaware that the resolution which I had the honor to offer the other day, and which the Senate passed, I think covers in every particular all that he desires to accomplish by this resolution. Certainly the Committee on Foreign Relations will not pretermit an inquiry into any of the matters which are suggested in this resolution. They are very anxious, and have already taken steps by summoning persons here, with proper papers and vouchers, to accomplish the very object which is sought to be accomplished through the Secretary of the Interior by the resolution of the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HIGGINS. Mr. President, the resolution which I have just offered seems to supplement the resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama as amended by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. MORGAN. That was amended by consent, I will say to the Senator. I amended it myself on his suggestion.

Mr. HIGGINS. Yes, and it is the standing order of the Senate upon that subject. This resolution is intended merely to point the inquiry to what is a matter of the largest concern to all who are interested in the success of this great enterprise and is merely instructing in the line of inquiry which has been laid out by the Committee on Foreign Relations for itself. My present request is merely that the resolution lie on the table and be printed, so that the Senate may see what is the object of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. HIGGINS. I think there can be no objection to its ultimate adoption, because it only leads to the eliciting of light on a subject on which of course no one wants darkness.

WEST VIRGINIA DIRECT TAX.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 9.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 9) to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the governor of the State of West Virginia the sum appropriated by the act of Congress entitled "An act to credit and pay to the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia all moneys collected under the direct tax levied by the act of Congress, approved August 5, 1861."

Mr. FRYE. There are certain provisions in our rules for the government of debate on all measures before the Senate under Rule VIII. Those provisions have been utterly disregarded from the beginning of the present session up to now. One is that no Senator shall speak more than five minutes, and another that he shall only be entitled to speak once.

Now, we have opened up under Rule VIII a measure which, knowing as I do the capacity of the Senators from the two Virginias for debate, I should say might be liable to occupy the rest of the session in the morning hour. The business on this Calendar is accumulating rapidly; we have made no progress with it for about ten days, and I wish to call the attention of the Senator from West Virginia and of the Senate to the fact that this Calendar is governed by certain special rules. Of course I do not expect to limit him now to five minutes, because the other side has had about an hour.

Mr. FAULKNER. An hour and a half

Mr. FRYE. But I shall certainly enter an objection to the consumption of any other morning hour than this on this joint resolution.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I appreciate fully the present condition of the Calendar and the delay in passing unobjected bills which would result if there should be a protracted discussion of Senate joint resolution No. 9 to the exclusion of other matters on the Calendar. I feel under many obligations to the Senate for its courtesy in extending, not only to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] an unlimited time for the discussion of this resolution by unanimous consent, but in extending to me a similar courtesy for a reply to the Senator from Virginia.

I shall endeavor this morning to be very brief. I shall only refer to matters directly coming within the scope of the report of the committee and upon which they have founded their action. I shall not permit myself to be drawn into a discussion of any irrelevant matters.

Mr. President, in the discussion yesterday I think I answered fully the objections of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] as to any inaccuracy of facts appearing in the record. I think I answered satisfactorily his argument that the report of the committee was an attempt to overrule the decision of the Attorney-General. I think I showed from the record in this case that there was no attempt on the part of the committee to overrule the Attorney-General, but that the objection of the committee to the action of the Treasury Department was that it had not carried out the instructions of the Attorney-General by ascertaining what was the equitable proportion of the debt due by West Virginia to Virginia, if any.

I think I further showed in that discussion that there were no powers or instrumentalities within the control of the Treasury Department to ascertain that fact, and it could not be ascertained in any manner, except through a settlement voluntarily entered into between the two States, or an involuntary settlement made before the Supreme Court of the United States, as the only tribunal having jurisdiction to hear and determine those questions.

Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of Senators to the fact I shall now lay before them. In my judgment it was the purpose and intention of Congress, in passing the act which refunded the direct tax to all the States which had paid that tax, and to release those which had not, to wipe out completely and entirely the original liability, whether it was assumed by the State or a liability resting upon the inhabitants thereof, as though the act had never been passed. The only States that were liable on bonds held by the Federal Government and which, in the payment of principal or interest, were in default, were those south of the Potomac. None of those States had paid a dollar of direct tax from their treasuries.

Whatever had been paid by them had been collected from the inhabitants directly by the officers of the Federal Government. Consequently when this law was passed and the Government determined to settle that whole question of the direct tax, to wipe it out as though it had never existed, it provided that all funds received either from the State or the inhabitants should be returned dollar for dollar, and that all uncollected amounts due from the inhabitants of the several States should be released by that act; but for fear that the Treasury Department would attempt to set off against these States south of the Potomac the amount collected from their inhabitants against liabilities due by the State and held by the Treasury Department, Congress inserted a provision in this act declaring that no such set-off should be made by the Treasury Department, and that this fund should be considered a trust fund, to be returned to the governor of the State whose inhabitants had paid it, and be by him returned to the parties entitled to it or their legal representatives when ascertained.

The representatives of West Virginia would, of course, have watched carefully the passage of this law if there had not been a decision already made by the Treasury Department that under facts similar to those which have now been made the basis of a different ruling, the Department had not held that there was no authority or right or justice upon the part of the United States Government to set off a demand by the State of West Virginia against the Government and apply it to the payment of the bonds of Virginia held in the Indian trust fund.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's time, under Rule VIII, has expired.

Mr. KENNA. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague's time may be extended so that he may conclude his statement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia? The Chair hears none.

Mr. COCKRELL. The time was extended yesterday during the discussion of this case, as I understood.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thought it was his duty to call the attention of the Senate to the fact The Senator will proceed.

Mr. FAULKNER. If this ruling of the Treasury Department is now permitted to stand, what will be the result? Take, for an illustration, the two States, the State of West Virginia and the State of Virginia. Under this act the State of Virginia, through its governor, has received, for money which was obtained from its inhabitants and collected by Federal officers, $442,000. The inhabitants of the State of Virginia have been released by this same act from the payment of $286,000 uncollected taxes under the direct-tax act of 1861; with that liberality on the part of Congress to the State of Virginia and to her citizens, is West Virginia to be punished and a penalty to be imposed upon that State by reason of the fact that, through its treasury, $153,000 of the amount of the direct tax due from the inhabitants of that State has been paid to the Federal Government?

In other words, we impose a penalty for the payment of the tax and release the unpaid tax of the individual citizens of those States and refund to those who have paid every dollar of the amount. It would be a very strange position for Congress to place itself in, to hold that a premium should be set upon the nonpayment of taxes and a penalty imposed for a compliance with the law.

Recognizing the fact that the Treasury Department has held that this fund should not be applied to the Virginia debt as early as 1868, the representatives of West Virginia did not attempt in the passage of the act refunding the direct tax to make any limitation which would have protected that State and which would have been acquiesced in, beyond question, by Congress.

I would say to the Senators who have so kindly given me their attention, that if this is enforced against the State of West Virginia by the Federal Government, it is the only State or Territory of this Union against which the direct-tax fund would be set off for any liability due by a State to the Federal Government. That is another equitable claim which I propose to submit to the Senate, and ask that it be fairly and earnestly considered.

Mr. President, I am going to hurry on and only allude to two other questions, and they will appeal, it strikes me, very strongly to the minds of Senators in considering this resolution. The first is as to whether or not in equity and good conscience, outside of any legal proposition at all, the United States is in a position to ask that the $153,000 due to the State of West Virginia should be applied to any indebtedness, even if it was an indebtedness due by the State to the United States.

When the United States approved the constitution of the State of Virginia it was then a creditor of the State, and when by the approval of that constitution it restored Virginia to all its rights in the Union it did so under a constitution which in express terms provided that the State of West Virginia, if it owed any indebtedness whatever to the State of Virginia, should pay that indebtedness into the treasury of that State.

Is there any conceivable position in which private parties could have a transaction similar to that between the State of Virginia, the State of West Virginia, and the United States as a creditor and be permitted to come in and make such a demand. The United States when a creditor approved the provision of the constitution of Virginia requiring West Virginia to pay any indebtedness existing prior to January, 1861, into the treasury of Virginia, but it now comes in and says, "I am not bound, I am not estopped by reason of the approval of that constitution at the very time when I held those bonds, but I demand now that, instead of acting according to the provisions of that constitution, you, the State of West Virginia, shall pay that money to me as a creditor of Virginia."

I say in honor, in conscience, and in equity the United States is estopped and should be barred from making any claim of that character, even though it had a legal right in this case to demand of the State of West Virginia, under other circumstances, the recovery of this $153,000 to be applied to the debt of Virginia.

Now, I will refer to the other proposition, on which the committee mainly rest their report. It is well-known to every lawyer that the right of set off is a right that exists not under any general principle of common law, but is a right that rests entirely for its enforcement upon statutory enactment. It can have no existence as a right except by virtue of a statute. Congress, realizing that fact, has in the case of individuals passed one statute, and in the case where there are bonds held by the government of a State in its corporate capacity another, allowing setoffs under certain circumstances.

In construing this act of setoffs, it is not to be construed, I admit, with the rigor and strictness of a criminal statute, but the full force and effect at least of the language of that statute, the object and purpose and policy of that statute, must be taken into consideration in the construction of it; and I will ask any Senator here whether he would vote for a statutory enactment which would give to the Secretary of the Treasury the power in a disputed matter between two sovereign States, or even in a dispute that did not appear as a finality upon the books of the Treasury Department, the power to go into disputed and intricate settlements, and to adjudicate those questions without reference to any tribunal whatever, except the Comptroller or the Auditor's Bureau of the Treasury Department. There is not a Senator who would vote for a bill embodying a power to a Secretary of the Treasury similar to that which I have described. If not, then the question is, whether a previous Congress has passed any law giving such a broad, wide, and unlimited power of investigation of complicated accounts and of disputed items to the Treasury Department, or to any bureau of it? I conceive there can be no question of doubt on that subject.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. FAULKNER. I do.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia if it is not a fact that the Government freely concedes that it owes the State of West Virginia $153,000?

Mr. FAULKNER. That is correct.

Mr. ALLEN. Is it not also a fact that the Government claims it has no express or liquidated offset against that demand?

Mr. FAULKNER. It is so certified by the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, in whose hands these bonds are.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand it has no ascertained offset against that demand at all.

Mr. FAULKNER. None whatever.

Mr. ALLEN. It is not even known that it has an unascertained offset against it; but whether it might have an unascertained or an unliquidated demand against the State of Virginia would be dependent upon the fact of there being such a balance due upon an equitable adjustment between old Virginia and West Virginia. Does not the Attorney-General disclaim all ability to cite the sovereign States to come before him in order that the executive department of the Government may ascertain whether or not there is such a balance existing in favor of the Government against the State of West Virginia on any settlement that might be made between these two States?

Mr. FAULKNER. I think in substance he does, by a doubt expressed as to the right to bring Virginia into any such suit before the Court of Claims.

Mr. ALLEN. It seems to me of necessity he must disclaim all authority for adjusting any such claim as that.

Mr. FAULKNER. In answer to the Senator from Washington as to the question whether there is any ascertainment of any indebtedness of a fixed and definite sum to which this set-off has been applied by the Comptroller of the Treasury, I will read the certificate of the Comptroller himself, which appears on the first page of the report, and the quotation will be found to be as follows:

To be credited as a set-off against the amount due from the State of West Virginia for her proportion of the undivided indebtedness of the State of Virginia to the United States for Indian trust funds that were invested in Virginia bonds prior to the division of the State.

He admits by the certificate in which he applies the $153,000 as an offset that it is an undivided indebtedness, unascertained by the Department, and in fact has not even certified that there is an existing indebtedness.

Mr. ALLEN. It is a mere conjecture that there is a possibility of an indebtedness.

Mr. FAULKNER. A mere conjecture of a possibility of indebtedness.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask the Senator what is the undivided indebtedness which is referred to? Is it not the whole amount invested in the Indian trust fund, which is the obligation of both States undivided?

Mr. FAULKNER. It is not, in the judgment of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, for the reason that in his letter, which I have taken the trouble to read, he tells the State of West Virginia that the undivided indebtedness to which he applies this set-off is the equitable proportion of the indebtedness due under the constitutional provision of the State of West Virginia: that it is not, as the Senator claims, the whole of the indebtedness due by both States to the Government of the United States.

Mr. DANIEL. When the equitable proportion is ascertained and accepted, it is then a divided indebtedness, but until the equitable proportion is ascertained, he refers to it as an undivided indebtedness.

Mr. FAULKNER. Not at all, because he states that he acts in accordance with the opinion of the Attorney-General, which requires of him to ascertain what is the equitable proportion of that debt, and before he can ascertain whether there is a debt due by West Virginia to Virginia under the terms of settlement and the constitution of that State he must find what this equitable proportion is. The Attorney-General says, "I know nothing as to this debt; I can not ascertain; it does not come within the jurisdiction of my Department;" and the Comptroller of the Treasury has certified that it has been applied to an undivided indebtedness in accordance with the judgment and the opinion of the Attorney-General, which required of him to ascertain the equitable proportion of the indebtedness between those States based upon the article of separation found in the ninth section of the ordinance of separation. That has not been done, and no attempt has been made to do it. Therefore there is no amount ascertained, and it is a guess, a speculation, a hope.

Mr. President, I have never understood until the unfortunate controversy which has arisen here in the Senate that Virginia or any representative of that State has ever paid the slightest attention to any previous settlements between West Virginia and the United States; and I desire to observe that so far as I am advised—and I have endeavored to ascertain the facts—and I am not blaming Virginia or any representative of Virginia for the ruling of the Treasury Department—I do not know and never have been informed that any official representing that government has ever interfered, though the settlement was a matter of public notoriety. The discussions of this question before the Attorney-General and before the Secretary of the Treasury were published in all the papers, but I have never heard that Virginia through any official action of hers interfered at that time or at any previous period in the history of these settlements between the State of West Virginia and the United States Government. On this floor for the first time have the representatives of Virginia interfered with this question at issue between the State of West Virginia and the United States.

When my friend, the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. ALLEN], interrupted me I was discussing the statute which alone is relied upon by the Treasury Department in sustaining its position in applying this as a set-off to the debt of Virginia. What is the language of that statute?

Whenever any State is in default in the payment of interest or principal on investments in stocks or bonds issued or guarantied by such State.

The language used by the framers of this was guarded. It said, so far as the Treasury Department was concerned, that if the books of the Department or those of any other Department of the Government showed that there were bonds issued or guaranteed by any State held and owned by this Government, and that the State had defaulted in its interest or on the principal of those bonds, the Treasurer might then offset any debt due by the United States to that State to the amount of the default upon the principal or interest due by that State.

But, sir, will any Senator construe that act to give the Secretary of the Treasury the authority, when the Secretary of the Interior certifies to him that there is not a dollar's liability appearing against the State of West Virginia upon the books of the Interior Department, but that the liability appears as that of the State of Virginia—would any Senator construe this statute as authorizing the Treasury Department to go into an examination entirely dehors the record, and upon proof aliunde the records to adjudicate that demand. Would not this confer upon the Treasury Department judicial functions, and authorize it by oral testimony, affidavits, or other means to ascertain whether a State whose bonds are not held by the Government, but who has, by some agreement affecting its political organization, become indebted to a State against whom the Government stands in the attitude of a creditor, and thus compel such State, without ascertaining any fixed and definite indebtedness due by it to the State whose bonds are held by the Government, to pay a portion of those bonds.

It strikes me, Mr. President, that such a construction of this statute would be an outrage upon common sense, would place the States in a position where any Secretary of the Treasury could summon the representatives of those States before him almost as a court could summon a third party to try a question of attachment, and enter judgment in favor of the United States against a State when no liability is shown by the records of his Department.

Mr. MITCHELL. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. FAULKNER. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask the Senator if it ever has been claimed at any time by the Government of the United States that it had a claim against the State of West Virginia, either directly or indirectly, on account of the debt of old Virginia?

Mr. KENNA. None whatever.

Mr. FAULKNER. Never has it been made but once, in 1868.

Mr. MITCHELL. Indirectly, of course, in that letter of the Attorney-General. That is the only record that I have been able to find looking to any claim upon the part of the Government, either directly or indirectly, against West Virginia, on account of the claim it has against old Virginia.

Mr. FAULKNER. Never has it been claimed by any Department of the Government of the United States or by Virginia up to this time, except in the year 1868. Then Mr. Browning, Secretary of the Interior, addressed a letter to Secretary McCulloch, of the Treasury Department, calling his attention to the fact that certain bonds of Virginia were held by him in trust for the Indians, and asking the Secretary of the Treasury to hold back from payment to West Virginia the amount of $456,000 to be applied upon that indebtedness due by Virginia and held by the Secretary of the Interior; and I desire to incorporate in my answer to the Senator from Oregon the reply of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Secretary of the Interior. I will only read the last clause. After quoting the ninth section of the ordinance of separation, he uses this language:

From this it is apparent that the adjustment of this question is a matter purely and entirely between the States, and depending upon debits and credits of which the accounting officers of the Government know nothing, and which are entirely beyond their reach.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then the Treasury Department said virtually in so many words that so far as the Treasury Department was concerned there was no claim.

Mr. FAULKNER. No claim. He proceeds further and says:

We have no charges against the State of West Virginia on account of this Indian trust fund, and of course no cause of action against her on that account. The bonds referred to by the Secretary of the Interior as held by that Department as Indian trust funds are those of the State of Virginia, and as that State took no measures to devolve the payment of any part of those bonds upon the State of West Virginia, and as the State of West Virginia entirely ignores all liability for them on grounds not only legal but entirely equitable, I am clearly of opinion that the Department has its remedy only against the State of Virginia, and that the State of West Virginia is entitled to receive the amount found due her, without any offsets or drawbacks on account of any of the debts or liabilities of the State of Virginia.

I maintain, Mr. President, that that is as clear, concise, and lucid a statement of the case now before the Senate as could be made by any official, and the correctness of it can not, it strikes me, be questioned by any lawyer.

To hold that under this statute of set-off the fund due to West Virginia should be taken and applied to the bonds of Virginia, you would have to find under the language of this statute, first, that West Virginia was in default in the payment of interest or principal—on what? Not on bonds that might have been issued by somebody else, which, under some political arrangement which had occurred would perhaps legally make West Virginia liable, even accepting the argument of my friend from Virginia, for the entire debt, but you must find that we were in default of interest or principal upon the bonds issued—that is the language of the statute—or upon bonds guarantied by the State of West Virginia. Is there a lawyer who, in construing this statute, will say that there has been default upon the part of West Virginia on any bonds issued by that State?

Mr. President, you are compelled to hold, in construing this statute to make West Virginia liable, that West Virginia in her corporate capacity issued or guarantied those bonds, and that West Virginia is in default in the payment of the interest or principal of bonds issued or guarantied by her. Can there be a doubt in the mind of a Senator that the Comptroller of the Treasury has committed an error when he held that there were bonds in the possession of the Government of the United States issued or guarantied by the State of West Virginia in her corporate capacity, and against which this offset could be applied.

I am satisfied, Mr. President, that it does not require a decision of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate to advise us of this error. It is too simple a proposition, it is too plain a legal question to leave any question of doubt but that it was an erroneous conclusion.

Mr. President, I admit I have taken up more time than was perhaps necessary in the discussion of this report. I feel a great interest in it, because it is a matter which affects very seriously the interests of my State.

I feel a further interest in the report that has been made, because I am the author of it, and I feel that if there were any inaccuracies in that report, if its legal conclusions could not be properly sustained by the judgment of the lawyers in this body, that perhaps some one might have the conception born in his mind that, by reason of a bias in favor of my State, I have been influenced in my conclusions either as to the fact or as to the law. But, sir, I think the case is so clear, it is so plain, it is so simple, it is so condensed that it takes very little time for anyone who will calmly, impartially, and without bias take it up and examine it to come to the conclusion that the facts are fairly and impartially stated and the conclusions are sustained by ample authority.

Mr. President, in reference to the motion of the Senator from Virginia, I desire to observe that if the Senate has lost confidence in the integrity, the judgment, or the ability of the Committee on Claims to pass upon legal questions which legitimately and properly come before them, then let the motion of the Senator from Virginia be carried, and stamp upon that committee the sentiment of your disapproval of their action and remove from that committee all the important cases affecting vitally the interests of the Government of the United States; transfer from that committee, also, the claims of the Commonwealth of Virginia itself, involving complicated questions of law and fact, and transfer it, with all other claims which involve questions of law, to the Judiciary Committee.

Go further, Senators, and say to the country and say to the Senate that the Committee on Claims as now constituted should be abolished, that it has no longer your confidence, and its usefulness is a thing of the past. Such action would place the Senate in the attitude of declaring that in every important claim that involves a legal question, its action, though unanimous, must be referred for the supervision, correction, and final adjudication of some other committee. I do not believe that the Senate is ready to take this step, and yet I say to Senators that if they vote in favor of the motion to refer, no other interpretation can be placed upon their act than the one which I here indicate.

I admit questions have arisen since I have been a member of this body upon the proper reference when a bill was introduced, but for the first time during my service has the Senate been asked to have reviewed by another committee the unanimous report of a standing committee of this body.

Mr. President, we stand here as coequals; the rights, privileges, and functions of each of these committees are fixed and determined by the rules of the Senate, and when one of the committees of this body has properly taken jurisdiction of a matter submitted to it, it is going very far for any Senator to rise in his place and say, "We are not satisfied with the report, we will take an appeal from the action of that committee by referring the question aleady adjudicated to another standing committee."

I earnestly hope that this question will be met on the floor of this Senate frankly, firmly, and according to the legal rights of the parties.

No Senator can accuse me of trying to take an unfair advantage of any one in reference to the claim presented by the State of West Virginia. It was introduced the first day of the session. It was known by every one in interest that it was pending before the Committee on Claims. It was not reported until some time after the recess, and I delayed calling it up, at the request of the Senators from Virginia, for a week. I had notified them that it would be taken up the day it was passed.

On the evening of the day of its passage, the senior Senator called my attention to a note received from the junior Senator, stating that he desired to be present when the resolution was before the Senate and that he was detained at his home by sickness.

While I did not conceive that his State had any interest in the matter, yet that was a question for his determination, and his alone, I at once promptly on the next morning, in accordance with an understanding with the senior Senator from Virginia, [Mr. DANIEL] entered the motion to reconsider.

Asking nothing at the hands of the Senate in behalf of the State of West Virginia that in law, justice, and equity she is not entitled to, I went further than that. I did not ask that this discussion should come up on the motion to reconsider. I asked unanimous consent of the Senate that the motion to reconsider should be agreed to; that the case should be put back upon the Calendar, No. 74, just where it stood before the action of this body; that it be submitted at once to the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, open to any amendment, any criticism, and any discussion that could occur upon the resolution as though it had never been before the Senate.

I invited discussion, I invited a thorough argument of the legal questions, but I insist that the Senate shall now consider this resolution as it considers all other bills. If the Committee on Claims has committed an error in its unanimous report in favor of Senate joint resolution No. 9 then the Senate should not pass it. It is either the right of the State to have the money or it is the right of the Government of the United States to have the $153,000 credited upon Virginia's bonds. Meet the issue squarely. Do what is right, do what justice and equity require, but do not try to sidetrack a resolution of this import reported by one committee unanimously, by referring it to another. I sincerely hope the Senate will not sustain the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I always rise to address the Senate with diffidence, and nothing but my position here as one of the Senators from Virginia would induce me to come forward to prolong this discussion. I do not propose to go into the law of this case, which has been fully presented and elaborately argued by the two gentlemen who have preceded me. I propose to call your attention to the question which is before the Senate: to its practical effect, to the objects which the Senators who brought the matter to the attention of the Senate intended.

Let me say, so far as the report of the Committee on Claims is concerned, that there is no effort, as I understand it, on the part of myself or of my colleague, to reflect upon that committee. I understood that in the motion to refer the question to the Committee on the Judiciary the object was to present the facts to the Senate. It so happened when that matter was considered in the Committee on Claims that Virginia was not heard at all. It so happened that her attendance was not invited. The matter was passed on ex parte statements, and the report was so made to the Senate. Unfortunately, I have been indisposed for the last two or three weeks, a great deal of the time confined to my house, and I have not been able to give much attention to the proceedings of the Senate. Our object has been gained now that the report has been brought to the attention of the Senate, and so far as I am concerned I am indifferent whether the subject goes to the Committee on the Judiciary or not. I believe that would be the appropriate committee to consider it.

When the joint resolution got down to the House of Representatives, what was done with it? One of the Representatives from West Virginia got up and moved its passage. The vigilant chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in the other House at once stopped it. He moved its reference to what committee? To the Committee on Claims? To the Committee on War Claims? No, sir. The experienced and able parliamentarian to whom I refer moved that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. President, what is the question presented in the resolution? The Senators have talked a great deal about the law of the case. My friend from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] has planted himself upon the law; he has given references to the decisions of the courts, and he has talked before the Senate of the United States as if he had a slow jury to hammer.

Sir, this is not a question of law. The Attorney-General says it is a mixed question of law and fact. I presume there is law enough around this Chamber, if you can get at the facts, to apply the law. It does not require these learned gentlemen in the law from the two Virginias or anywhere else to instruct the Senate as to the application of the law. If the Senator from West Virginia stood upon the law why does he come here and ask the Senate to adopt this joint resolution? If your legal rights are sufficient, why did you not get your money? That is the question. But the Senator asks the Senate to reverse the action of the executive department of the Government, to set aside the opinion of the Attorney-General, and when he can not draw his money, he comes here with his resolution and asks Congress to give him the money which the executive department had declined upon mixed questions of law and fact. What is it the Senator wants? The resolution authorizes what can not be done without it. It authorizes the State of West Virginia to come here and put its hands in the United States Treasury for $153,000. That is what you want, and why?

Suppose Virginia, the parent State, were to come forward and ask that some money which has to be paid should go into her pocket, would not she have been met with the act of Congress which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to retain any fund where it appears that any State owes the Government of the United States? Of course the State of Virginia would have been stopped, the State of Virginia could not have drawn the money; and how is it with the State of West Virginia, which is here only because she was a part of Virginia? She comes forward here and is known only in the Senate because she sprang from Virginia, the parent stock. It so happens that there was an old debt prior to 1861, which had been incurred by Virginia when West Virginia and the present Virginia were one and the same State.

Bonds of that old State had been issued to borrow money to carry on the internal improvement system of the State mainly, a system in which West Virginia was largely interested. Now, if you concede that Virginia could not come here under similar circumstances and ask for this money, how is it that West Virginia can do it? Did not West Virginia, at the time these bonds were created, belong to Virginia? Does West Virginia, after having withdrawn her resources from the old State, when these very bonds were created upon the strength of those resources, now with the taxable subjects all withdrawn, so far as West Virginia was concerned; does the young and vigorous State want to go off with all the money in her pocket and contribute nothing to meet the past obligations of Virginia, which she had jointly incurred with Virginia?

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this case is not so plain as my friend from West Virginia would made it. Looking at it as a business transaction, looking at it from whatever light you may, it seems to me that West Virginia is honorably bound to share the burden with the parent State.

But you have got to bear in mind another fact, that before that division took place, before West Virginia was erected into a separate and independent State, she had to make terms. In the ordinance of the Legislature of Virginia, which allowed the creation of the new State, it was declared that she should assume a just proportion of the debt of Virginia prior to January, 1861.

Under that ordinance she had to follow up those provisions further by putting in the constitution under which she was admitted as one of the States of the United States a provision that she would bear her equitable proportion of the old debt of Virginia.

Why has she not done it? That is a question that I do not care to go into. I claim that she is bound by her own act to make a contribution to this debt of Virginia.

It must be remembered, Mr. President, that the debt to the United States is now about $1,600,000. Virginia paid a little interest on it from 1867 to 1870, and it is but a small portion of that which West Virginia, in case of the defeat of this resolution, is called upon to contribute. It would have been thought, notwithstanding all the declamation which we have heard on the subject, that the young and rich State of West Virginia, with her great mineral resources, with her undeveloped material wealth, would have been only too happy to have stepped forward and to have assisted the old State in relieving her of her obligations, when she remembered that she had gone through all the struggles of the war untouched, as it were, while the old mother State, battle-scarred and war-worn, had been traversed from the east to the west and in every direction by armed forces; her barns had been burned, her personal property destroyed, and the taxable values out of which to raise money to pay debts had been removed by the act of war.

I do not think that West Virginia is entitled to any great credit when she saw a little chance of throwing something into the Treasury of the United States—not into the treasury of Virginia—but she should have stepped forward and said, "We have lost nothing; we have contributed nothing in the past. Virginia carried us financially for years and years, and why should not we, by virtue of our own acts and under all the surroundings, let this small amount go to the relief of Virginia?"

I doubt very much, Mr. President—and the ground has been taken by an abler mind than my own—whether the State of Virginia is bound for its antewar debt. After having its personal property destroyed, after having all the values which attach to a civilized community removed by the hand of war, I doubt whether the conquering power, under the public law which has always prevailed, should not have taken up the debt and released the State of Virginia. I believe that ground is taken by Mr. Blaine in his celebrated work. But, be that as it may, we are not here asking for any recognition of that sort. All that we ask is that if these gentlemen of West Virginia are to get this $153,000, the State of Virginia, which could not have got it under similar circumstances, shall have a credit in the adjustment of her debt to the Federal Government of this amount of $153,000. If the Senator is willing to accept that amendment, I have no sort of objection to the passage of the resolution.

I claim, however, that if the Senate decides that West Virginia is not bound to contribute to Virginia her proportion of the debt to the United States, it would be an unfair resolution on your part, as far as Virginia is concerned.

This is not the place to decide these questions between Virginia and West Virginia, I admit; but so far as the Government of the United States is concerned, so far as their interests are attached to either Virginia or West Virginia, I claim that a release to the one State ought to operate as a release to both. I do not know—I am not lawyer enough to decide—that such will be the effect of the adoption of the resolution

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CALL in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 1549) providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the matter which was pending is passed over, I should be glad to learn from the Senators from Virginia and West Virginia, as I have not been able to hear the whole discussion, how much the State of Virginia owes the United States.

Mr. DANIEL. I think it has been stated, including interest from January, 1861, to amount to $1,600,000.

Mr. FAULKNER. There is an offset by Virginia against that which the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] stated yesterday in the discussion brings it down about $150,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall be glad to know of the Senator from West Virginia if the State of West Virginia admits any liability, either equitable or otherwise, to pay any portion of this debt, or does she regard herself as absolutely excluded from any obligation to pay it?

Mr. FALKNER. The State of West Virginia, according to the opinion of the junior Senator from West Virginia, recognizes any liability resulting from the separation of the old State into two sovereignties in accordance with the basis fixed by the ordinance of separation in the ninth section, which the Senator from West Virginia regards as a condition-precedent to the formation of the State of West Virginia, and that when West Virginia was formed into a State under the Constitution and laws of the United States, it was an acceptance by all parties of the condition precedent prescribed in the ordinance of separation, and whenever that settlement is made, if there is anything due, the constitution of West Virginia authorizes the issuing of bonds for the payment of that liability to the State of Virginia, but not to a creditor.

Mr. ALLISON. I understood the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR], who has just taken his seat, to state that by our votes here on this question we are about to decide whether the United States is to hold the State of West Virginia for its proper proportion of the entire debt that may be due from the old State of Virginia to the United States. Now, for one, I do not wish to so vote. I wish by any vote I may cast here to hold on to the obligation, which I think is just on the part of the old State of Virginia, including the new State, to pay its creditors, whoever they may be and wherever they may be.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state, with the indulgence of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls attention to the fact that this discussion is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANDERSON. I feel obliged to object to further discussion. This, as I understand, is merely a motion to refer the joint resolution to a committee.

Mr. FAULKNER. The joint resolution is before the Senate for its consideration, and a motion to refer has been made.

Mr. MANDERSON. This discussion does not bear upon the merits of the measure. While it is exceedingly interesting, it is blocking the way to other matters that are somewhat important, and I feel constrained to object. If the Senator wishes simply to answer the question of the Senator from Iowa, I shall feel differently, but it simply seems to be prolonging the agony into another long debate.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state to the Senator from Iowa that according to my honest judgment, so far as his vote is concerned on this resolution, it would not affect that question at all. That question at least would not be affected by the result of the vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there unanimous consent to the discussion proceeding?

Mr. MANDERSON. I call for the regular order now, Mr. President.

Mr. FRYE. I wish to suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that he make this joint resolution the special order for to-morrow after 2 o'clock.

Mr. FAULKNER. Well, Mr. President, I shall be very glad to make it in this form, that it shall follow the unfinished business now before the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. It would do so if made the special order.

Mr. FAULKNER. Suppose we do not finish the bill which is now the unfinished business by to-morrow, then the joint resolution would lose its place.

Mr. FRYE. No, it remains the special order until the unfinished business is concluded.

Mr. FAULKNER. Then I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution which has been under consideration this morning be made the unfinished business for to-morrow at 2 o'clock.

Mr. KENNA. With the understanding, as I understood the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to suggest, that the joint resolution shall not interfere with the printing bill, as it is called, which remains the unfinished business.

Mr. PADDOCK. I have been waiting here for two weeks for the printing bill to get out of the way, so that the pure-food bill could take the place to which it was entitled before the printing bill was considered. I can not give way for any other purpose. I gave notice some days ago that when the consideration of the pending bill was determined, whatever might be the situation, I should move to take up the pure-food bill, and I shall do it.

Mr. FAULKNER. The joint resolution which has been under consideration I am satisfied will not take up much more time of the Senate.

Mr. MANDERSON. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order being the printing bill, so called, it is now before the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 4631) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge at Burlington, Iowa," approved August 6, 1888, as amended by act approved February 21, 1890; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

SENATOR FROM MARYLAND.

Mr. GORMAN. I present the credentials of my colleague, Mr. GIBSON, and ask that they be read.

The credentials of Mr. CHARLES H. GIBSON, elected by the Legislature of Maryland a Senator from that State for the term beginning March 4, 1891, were read, and ordered to be filed.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask that the oath of office be now administered to my colleague.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator-elect will please advance to the desk to receive the oath of office.

Mr. GIBSON, escorted by Mr. GORMAN, advanced to the desk of the Vice-President, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1549) providing for the public printing and binding, and the distribution of public documents.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that lines 75 to 83 of section 77 may be read. I think there should be a correction there, as it has been amended.

The Secretary read, beginning in line 75 of section 77, on page 35, as follows:

> The Secretary of State shall cause to be printed and bound at the Government Printing Office as many volumes of the Revised Statutes of the United States and the supplement to the Revised Statutes of the United States, volume 1, second edition, 1874 to 1891, authorized under the act of April 9, 1890, and the second Supplement to the Revised Statutes authorized under the act of April 9, 1890, as he may deem needful for public distribution and for sale by his office at the cost thereof.

Mr. MANDERSON. I move to strike out the words "and the second Supplement to the Revised Statutes authorized under the act of April 9, 1890," as those words are repeated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANDERSON. Now, I move, in lines 81 and 82 of the same section, to strike out the words "he may deem needful for public distribution," and insert in lieu thereof what I send to the desk.

This amendment will reach the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], made when the bill was last under consideration, and also by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 81, section 77, on page 35, it is proposed to strike out "he may deem needful for public distribution" and insert "may be needed for distribution to designated depositories, State and Territorial libraries, and the United States courts not already supplied."

Mr. MANDERSON. That then makes as to State, Territorial, and public libraries, to the designated depositories, and to the courts, a distribution of the second Supplement where they have not already been supplied.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill at line 84 of section 77, and read to line 122.

Mr. MANDERSON. On behalf of the committee I offer an amendment to come in at the end of line 122. I move to insert at the end of that line—> and the superintendent of documents 500 copies, for distribution to State and Territorial libraries and to designated depositories.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the effect of that amendment? This is an economical bill, as I understand it, and here is proposed an increase of 500 copies of one of the most costly publications. What is the necessity for it?

Mr. MANDERSON. It is a very large decrease of the gross amount, and it is a better distribution. This amendment is moved by the committee because of the demand from nearly every librarian in the United States that the session laws and the Statutes at Large should be distributed to public libraries and to State and Territorial libraries. Hitherto none of the laws, whether they were the pamphlet laws published at the end of a session or the Statutes at Large, have been received by these libraries. It is thought well to supply them with these publications, as they are also to be supplied under the terms of the bill with the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which they have never heretofore received.

Mr. TELLER. With the bound CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. MANDERSON. With the bound CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read to line 157 of section 47.

Mr. MANDERSON. I offer an amendment to come in after the word "copy," in line 153.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment moved by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 153 of section 77, after the word "copy," insert:

> And the Public Printer shall deliver 500 copies of the Statutes at Large to the superintendent of documents for distribution to State and Territorial libraries and to designated depositories.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read to line 169 of section 77, the last paragraph read being as follows:

> The message of the President, without the accompanying documents and reports, shall be printed, immediately upon its receipt by Congress, in pamphlet form. Fifteen thousand shall be printed, of which 5,000 shall be for the Senate and 10,000 for the House.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is, to print the message of the President, with the accompanying documents and reports? They are to be printed immediately upon their receipt by Congress, in pamphlet form?

Mr. MANDERSON. Without the accompanying documents, not with them.

Mr. COCKRELL. Without the accompanying documents?

Mr. MANDERSON. That is, the bare message of the President. This is new legislation, and it is inserted simply because of the fact that it is the custom of each House of Congress to order a varying number, from 10,000 to 25,000 copies, of the message of the President of the United States by either simple or concurrent resolution. It is thought well, as that has been done at nearly every session of Congress, that it should be made a part of the general law.

The Secretary read from line 170 to line 178 of section 77, as follows:

> Of the President's message and accompanying documents and of the annual reports of the Departments to Congress there shall be printed 1,000 copies for the Senate and 2,000 for the House: Provided, That of the reports of the Chief of Engineers of the Army, the Commissioner of Patents, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, the report of the Chief Signal Officer of the War Department, and of the Chief of Ordnance the usual number only shall be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. "The President's message and accompanying documents." Does that contain all the reports of the heads of Departments?

Mr. MANDERSON. It contains the reports of all the heads of Departments, with the exception, I think, of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and perhaps of the Secretary of State. At any rate, I think two of the Departments make report directly to Congress. The language of the paragraph is that "of the President's message and accompanying documents and of the annual reports of the Departments to Congress," following the language of the existing law.

Mr. ALLISON. The Secretary of the Treasury reports directly to Congress.

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes, the Secretary of the Treasury reports directly to Congress, and I think one other Department chief.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has the Senator a copy of the message and accompanying documents last issued?

Mr. MANDERSON. I have not at my desk. It is rather a voluminous document to bring into the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have sent for a copy. It is remarkably strange to me, if I am not mistaken in my supposition, that the report of the Attorney-General is not included in the message and accompanying documents. You will find the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Currency, the Director of the Mint, the heads of the bureaus, and all that, but we have no report from the State Department. The report of the Secretary of State is printed in a separate volume, "Diplomatic Correspondence." I wanted to inquire why it is, if I am correct, that the report of the Attorney-General, the head of one of the oldest Departments, is left out of the President's message and accompanying documents.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is because of some legislation not found in any printing act, and it is not found in this bill. We have not attempted in this bill to provide as to the character of reports or how they should be made. That the committee did not consider within the purview of their duty. But as to such reports as are made by the Departments, whether they go to the President and are by him transmitted with his message, or whether they come directly to Congress, as is the case with the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, we provide that there shall be printed (besides the usual number printed in the same quantity that they have heretofore been printed) 1,000 for the Senate and 2,000 for the House. We except, however, from this additional number to be printed certain reports very voluminous in their character and very expensive to print, and we think that as to those the usual number will probably be sufficient. Congress could, of course, at any time order an additional number printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I shall move to strike out from the proviso the words "the Comptroller of the Currency." There is a good reason why extra copies of the report of the Chief of Engineers of the Army should not be printed, because that is a very voluminous report and does not contain information that is of general value and that is appreciated, but the first volume of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency and the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue are important documents. I have a great many calls particularly for the reports of the Comptroller of the Currency. A great many people apply for them. I have never been able to supply the demand, but have generally exhausted the supply of the document room in unbound form of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency. In that report is discussed the question of circulation per capita, the amount of money in the Treasury, and how the business of the country is transacted, whether by actual money handled, or by receipts, drafts, checks, confidence money, and so on. I hardly think it would be wise policy to restrict the publication of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency. As to the reports of the Chief of Engineers, the Commissioner of Patents, the Chief Signal Officer of the War Department, and the Chief of Ordnance, I do not know that there is any necessity for extra copies of them, but I think we had better not include in the proviso the report of the Comptroller of the Currency and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. MANDERSON. Let me call the attention of the Senator to the fact that both the reports to which he refers contain a very large amount of matter in the form of appendices that I do not think are important.

Mr. COCKRELL. The appendixes are never printed.

Mr. MANDERSON. They are printed as part of the reports.

Mr. COCKRELL. No, I beg pardon, not in the one volume, and never have been.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not care whether there is one volume or two or three, they constitute in general terms the report of the Comptroller of the Currency. In other words, his report is not only the report proper, but it is the report with the appendixes, and it is in that form that it comes to Congress.

There is a provision here which permits the Department head to order as many of these reports as he may desire within reasonable limits. Perhaps that might reach the end the Senator has in view. The object of the committee in having only the usual number of these particular reports printed was to save what seemed to be an unnecessary expense in printing. For instance, the list of banks, with the officers of banks and their capitalization, forms part of the report of the Comptroller, and the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue contains that detailed accounting which he has with the different collectors of internal revenue. If the Senator thinks that it is important to print 3,000 copies in addition to the usual number of these reports, I of course have no objection, but it seemed to the committee that it was not advisable.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me ascertain the fact now. Is the number that is to be printed simply for the use of the Senate and House? We do not get any bound copies of the reports of the Comptroller of the Currency. We do not get bound copies of any of the reports here mentioned except the one volume containing the message, and that is one bound volume called the Abridgment. In the abridgment there is no part of the appendixes ever printed. If these are the unbound documents for the document rooms, I admit very frankly that there is very little necessity for publishing the whole number of the second volume of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, which only gives a list of all the national banks in the United States, their location, the amount of their capital, their liabilities, etc., and there they come in one after the other, all through. It is a large volume, and there is very little call for it; but the report of the Comptroller of the Currency discussing the question belonging to his Bureau is an important document. I have very frequent calls for it, and for some years it has always been printed, as I say, in a separate form.

If the proviso refers simply to those that are going to the document room, I would only want volume 1 of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency excepted, because it comes to us now all the time in two volumes. One volume is the report proper, and that is the one which is called for. That gives the amount of business transacted in the country, the kind of money with which it is transacted, and the increase or decrease of the bank circulation, etc.

Mr. MANDERSON. This provision of the bill is in no respect different from the existing law as passed in the year 1864, except that we exclude certain documents from the printing of extra numbers. This language is based on section 3798 of the Revised Statutes:

> Of the documents named in this section there shall be printed and bound, in addition to the usual number for Congress, the following numbers of copies, namely:
> First. Of the documents accompanying the annual reports of the Executive Departments—

That unquestionably means the reports that come direct to Congress from the Executive Departments—

> 1,000 copies for the use of the members of the Senate and 2,000 copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives.
> Second. Of the President's message, the annual reports of the Executive Departments, and the abridgment of accompanying documents, unless otherwise ordered by either House, 10,000 copies for the use of the members of the Senate and 25,000 copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives.

That refers to the abridgment, which is disposed of in another section of the bill.

> Third. Of papers relating to foreign affairs, accompanying the annual message of the President, 2,000 copies for the use of the members of the Senate and 4,000 copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives.
>
> Fourth. Of the Commercial Relations, annually prepared under the directions of the State Department, 2,000 copies for the use of the members of the Senate and 3,000 copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives.
>
> Fifth. Of the annual report on the statistics of commerce and navigation, exports and imports, merchandise in transit, manufactures, and registered and enrolled vessels, prepared by the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, 2,000 copies for the use of the members of the Senate and 6,150 copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives.
> Sixth. Of the public Journals of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, 1,550 copies.

What we have aimed to do is to base this proposed legislation upon that old statute, having it in no wise different except in the respect I have mentioned.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator tell me where is the section that provides for the publication of the abridgment of the President's message and accompanying documents?

Mr. MANDERSON. It is at the foot of page 42, commencing at line 251:

> The Joint Committee on Printing shall appoint, etc.

Mr. COCKRELL. If I understand the way it is done now, a certain number of the reports of the different Departments are printed in unbound form.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is a part of the usual number.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, the usual number. Then we have printed "Foreign Relations." That is from the State Department. Then we have a report from the Secretary of State. We then have the War Department report. Then we have the Navy Department report. They all come in separately. In 1880–'81 we commenced printing these Department reports separately. In 1881–'82 the report of the Navy Department was in one volume, in 1882–'83 three volumes, in 1883–'84 two volumes, and so on, and in 1886–'87 it was in only one volume. Of the reports of the Interior Department we commenced separate volumes in 1880–'81, at the same time, and they form three volumes, four volumes, five volumes, etc. The Post-Office Department report never has been in more than one volume. The State Department report, which now comes under the designation of "Foreign Relations," never made more than one volume, except in 1888-'89, when it made two volumes. The War Department commenced in 1880-'81 with six volumes, and in 1889-'90 ran up to eight volumes. Prior to that time we got them in the form of the message of the President and accompanying documents unabridged. That included the whole of them.

I do not think that the Treasury Department report contains these appendices. I do not see it put down here in this list of documents that I have, which purports to be a list of all documents that are furnished to the document room. I have never found that the Finance Report, as it is put down here, ever had more than one volume, except in certain years. The Finance Report of the Treasury Department contains the report of the Secretary of the Treasury and the reports proper of the heads of Treasury bureaus, but it does not contain an appendix. The report of the Comptroller of the Currency has never contained more than one volume, while the War Department reports contain all the appendices and everything of the kind.

I have here the abridgment of the message and accompanying documents. I can not find in that any report at all from the Attorney-General. Now, we ought to have some uniformity in this matter. If the reports of the other Departments are printed I do not see why the Attorney-General's report should not be printed. It is never a very large report; it is generally a small report. In the message and documents which I have here, the abridgment of 1890-'91, we have the message of the President, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, without any of the accompanying documents; then comes the report of the Secretary of War, the report of the Secretary of the Navy, the report of the Secretary of the Interior, and that contains the pension report, the Land Office report, the report on railroads, education, etc. It is very voluminous compared with the others; it embraces over half the book. Then comes the report of the Postmaster-General and of the Secretary of Agriculture, but there is nothing from the Attorney-General.

I wished to call attention to this because we ought to understand that if this is an abridgment of the message and documents it ought to contain the reports of the heads of all the Departments at least, whether it has the bureau reports in it or not. A gentleman picking up this volume would expect to find in it the report of the Attorney-General, which is never a long one, and yet it is not here, although the Department of Justice is one of the oldest Departments; it began with the organization of the Government. I understand that the report of the Attorney-General does not form any part of this abridgment.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Attorney-General makes a report annually.

Mr. COCKRELL. Of course he makes a report.

Mr. MANDERSON. To whom does he make the report?

Mr. COCKRELL. He makes the report to the President.

Mr. MANDERSON. And does not the President transmit that report to Congress?

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. MANDERSON. Then why is it not included?

Mr. COCKRELL. The Lord only knows, unless it is the Printing Committee, who ought to know about it. I can not divine the reason why it is not here.

Mr. MANDERSON. Perhaps the Committee on Printing ought to have all wisdom; and if they were required to know all the gentleman does not seem to know about printing they would have a vast deal of information.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am just calling attention to the fact, and I can not account for the report of the Attorney-General being left out.

Mr. MANDERSON. Does not this language include it: "The President's message and accompanying documents?"

Mr. COCKRELL. Unless it is changed from the existing language used so as to make it specific it will not do it, because they will go on in the same way. I am trying to assist the Senator in getting it so that we shall know what is in these documents and not leave it to Tom, Dick, and Harry down at the Printing Office or somewhere else to say whether this report or that report shall go in the volume.

I hold in my hand this document, as I stated. It is remarkable. Take another one of these volumes. In all probability you will find not only the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, but the report proper of the Comptroller of the Currency, and so on. But in this abridgment, "Message and Documents," we have, first, the message of the President of the United States; then comes the report of the Secretary of the Treasury proper, just that part which is sent to us in a little bit of a pamphlet at the beginning of a session, without anything else added to it, and which, as compared with the other, is a very small report. It contains, however, matter from the Treasurer, and so on. Then we come to the Interior Department, and it contains a large number of the bureau reports. All I want is to have some uniformity; and if we have an abridgment of the message and documents let it contain the President's message and the report proper of each head of a Department, and then of as many bureaus condensed as can be put in. I do not know whether this section will reach that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri will be stated.

Mr. MANDERSON. Before departing from this subject, if the Senator is really desirous of information, I think he will find it, with reference to the report of the Attorney-General, by referring to the Attorney-General's letter on page 353 of the committee's report, in which he gives the number of his reports that have been printed on the requisitions of his Department. If the Senator will turn to page 270 of the report of the committee he will find, as to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, that of his annual report to Congress there are two editions:

The first is a small volume, limited to the report proper.

Not the first volume, but the first edition.

The second or large volume exhibits the condition of the national banks.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is in two volumes always.

Mr. MANDERSON—

The number of volumes of the latter printed each year will average about 70 per cent of the whole.

Then he gives in other terms the number distributed and how distributed, and the cost. All this has been printed under requisitions from the Treasury Department.

Mr. COCKRELL. We all know that these reports are printed by the Departments; but this provision is not for the regulation of the printing of the Departments, is it?

Mr. MANDERSON. I was trying to give the Senator information as to what is contained in the two volumes to which he has referred. If he will turn to this page of the report he will discover it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am trying to get the Senator to understand that the report of the Attorney-General is not printed in the abridgment, the "Message and Documents," and that is what is referred to here, I understand, by "the President's message and accompanying documents." I know it is printed separately, but I am trying in this connection to get at what ought to be printed with the President's message in what is known as the abridgment.

Mr. MANDERSON. As to the abridgment, we shall reach that later. That provision is on page 42.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out the words "the Comptroller of the Currency," in line 175, because I think there ought to be no restriction on that report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 175 strike out the words "the Comptroller of the Currency."

Mr. MANDERSON. While perhaps that amendment is not strictly in order at this time, I have no objection to its being moved and voted on. Let us perfect the section as we go along if we can.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read the next paragraph of section 77, as follows:

The following reports required by law to be made to Congress shall not be printed unless the printing be recommended by the head of the Department making the same, and ordered by concurrent resolution of Congress, namely: Report of contracts for conveying the mails, report of fines and deductions in the Post-Office Department, and accounts of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, and the report of the proceedings of the annual meetings of the Board of Supervising Inspectors of Steam Vessels.

Mr. MANDERSON. I call attention to this provision. These documents we provide shall not be printed unless recommended by the head of a Department and ordered by concurrent resolution of Congress. If Senators will examine they will find that it is utterly useless to go to the expense of publishing these volumes. Take the report, for instance, of contracts for conveying the mails. That is an enormous quarto volume.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is about as large as these two volumes together (indicating "Message and Documents, Abridgment").

Mr. MANDERSON. It is about that size. We have been printing them for years, and I doubt if any Senator has been called on for a single copy.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think I have sent away three or four of them.

Mr. MANDERSON. We certainly ought to discontinue the publication. Take the report of the fines and deductions in the Post-Office Department. The volume is one even larger than we have described. When a post-office clerk is fined fifteen or twenty cents his name and the amount of the fine inflicted will be found in this publication. I can not imagine that it is of interest to anybody. The same criticism might be made upon the other documents mentioned here that have been printed in the usual number. I think a very important change in this bill is the economy in that direction.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the section, and read to line 198, the last paragraph read being as follows:

Of the Registers of the Army and Navy, 1,500 copies of each, 500 for the Senate and 1,000 for the House.

Mr. MANDERSON. This is a new provision of law. The Registers of the Army and Navy have always been printed under the requisition of those Departments, and the only way that members of Congress obtained them was by making calls upon the Departments. It seemed to the committee that it was desirable that we should have at least a few copies for distribution by members of Congress.

Mr. COCKRELL. I must confess that I am a little astounded at the statement that the Army and Navy Registers have not been printed for distribution by Congress.

Mr. MANDERSON. They have not, except the usual number.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is meant by "the usual number"—for the document room?

Mr. MANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think if the Senator will look in his "list of documents" he will find in the folding room to his credit the Army Register and Navy Register for every solitary year, with one or two exceptions. It has been printed in limited numbers, I think for awhile we got either 10 or 11 copies, and I think the last distribution was about 9. I can recall only one year when we did not get the Army Register placed to our credit in the folding room of the Senate, and not among the unbound documents in the document room.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not know a better authority upon the proposition in dispute between the Senator and myself than the superintendent of the document room. These books have been printed in the usual number, and extra numbers for distribution by Congress have rarely been printed. I thought they had not been printed at all, but I am informed by the superintendent of the document room that at rare intervals extra copies have been printed by concurrent resolution of Congress.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The Secretary read to line 219 of section 77.

Mr. COCKRELL. The last clause read is as follows:

Of the Finance Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Report on Commerce and Navigation, on Internal Commerce, of the Director of the Mint on the Production of Precious Metals, and of Mineral Resources of the United States.

Is "Mineral Resources of the United States" a part of the description of the Report of the Director of the Mint on the Production of Precious Metals, or is it the volume published by the Geological Survey and called Mineral Resources of the United States?

Mr. MANDERSON. My impression is that it is the latter, but I am not positive about it. My impression is that this is a report from the Geological Survey and that the other is the report of the Director of the Mint. Yes, the Senator is correct in his statement; it is the report of the Geological Survey, the "Mineral Resources of the United States." The Report of the Director of the Mint on the Production of Precious Metals, as the term signifies, comes from the Director.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is one book that is referred to, and the Mineral Resources of the United States is a separate one?

Mr. MANDERSON. That is a separate one.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is what I wanted to get at.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill and read to line 234 of section 77, the last paragraph read being as follows:

There shall be printed of eulogies of deceased Senators, Representatives, and Delegates 5,000 copies, of which number one-half shall be delivered to the Senators, Representatives, or Delegates of the State or Territory represented by the deceased. The remaining number shall be distributed equally among the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of other States and Territories. The engraving for such eulogies shall be done at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and paid for out of the appropriation for that Bureau. Of the "usual number" the bound volume shall contain in one volume for each House all eulogies during the session of Congress upon Senators and Representatives, respectively.

Mr. MANDERSON. This is a material departure from the existing condition. If Senators interested in this subject will turn to page 456 of the committee's report and read No. 29 they will find that heretofore there have been printed varying numbers of copies, reaching from 4,500 in 1876 to 25,000 copies in 1891. For a long time the number of copies printed was 12,500. It seemed to the committee that if there was a new method of distribution a smaller number of copies could be profitably printed. So, instead of there being an even division of eulogies among all Senators from the Senate quota and among all Representatives and Delegates from the House quota, the proposition is that 2,500 copies of the 5,000 shall be delivered to the Senators, Representatives, or Delegates of the State or Territory represented by the deceased member.

Of course the demand would naturally be greater from the State represented by the deceased. The remainder is to be distributed equally among Senators, Representatives, and Delegates. I certainly think this is a very wise provision and one that will commend itself to Senators upon thought.

Then we provide, in the direction of saving expense, that instead of printing in the usual number a small volume for each of the eulogies they shall be collected in each session of Congress and bound in one volume of what used to be called the reserve documents. That is also an important change.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator will observe that there is no distribution made between the Senate and House of these 5,000 copies. I think we ought to have a distribution there. Who is to determine how this distribution shall be made?

Mr. MANDERSON. There is a distribution provided by the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL—

The remaining number shall be distributed equally among the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates of other States and Territories.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is, 2,500 copies go to the Senators and Representatives from the State represented by the deceased in Congress; and the other 2,500 shall be equally distributed among all Senators, Representatives, and Delegates.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is not the distribution we have been having?

Mr. MANDERSON. No; it is not the distribution we have been having.

Mr. COCKRELL. The ratio of distribution is not just. A Senator, for distribution in the whole State, gets just as many copies as a member of Congress for a district. I ask the Senator if he thinks that is just?

Mr. MANDERSON. I do. I think that is very fair and a better distribution than the present method.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think so.

Mr. MANDERSON. I know it is a new departure. I know Senators representing entire States——

Mr. COCKRELL. I am opposed to this departure, and I shall certainly move to amend this proportion, and make it entirely different from what it is now. I want so many distributed to the Senate and so many distributed to the House. Let the proportion that goes to the House be divided one-half among the members in the House from that State, and let one-half that come to the Senate go to the Senators from that State, the balance to be divided equally.

Mr. MANDERSON. It is the Senator's privilege to move to amend the bill at the proper time.

Mr. COCKRELL. Such a provision I think would be just. I think there is some propriety in the general idea of giving the Senators and Representatives from the State of the deceased a larger number than the others, although I have always found by application to Senators that they very cheerfully and cordially extended the courtesy of delivering a part of their quota to the Senator from the State of the deceased. I do not know whether it is better to leave that as it is or not, but if we are going to change the distribution I want to make it that way, and I give notice that I shall move that amendment when the committee amendments have been acted upon.

The Chief Clerk read to line 255 of section 77, the last clause read being as follows:

The Joint Committee on Printing shall appoint a competent person, who shall edit such portion of the reports and documents accompanying the annual message of the President as they may deem suitable for popular distribution, and prepare an alphabetical index thereto.

Mr. MANDERSON. I think here very properly may come in the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri, with which I am in full accord.

The report of the Attorney-General comes, I have ascertained, directly to Congress, and does not go to the President, just as the report of the Secretary of the Treasury comes directly to Congress, and does not go to the President. I think it might be well, perhaps, after the word "President," in line 254, to insert "and executive reports made directly to Congress." That probably would reach the idea. I quite agree with the Senator from Missouri that, in this abridgment, there should be not only an abridgment of the reports made through the President to Congress, but also those made directly to Congress. I think, perhaps, the change I suggest will meet the Senator's view.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes; right after the word "President," insert "or made directly to Congress;" so as to read:

Who shall edit such portion of the reports and documents accompanying the annual message of the President or made directly to Congress.

Mr. MANDERSON. That is it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I thought it was a very great anomaly that
